That is one of a thousand similar dispatches which might be read. Now I read an extract from the New York Press, under the head of "The Battle of the Toilers," for the purpose of calling attention to the number of persons out of employment. Says the editor:

Last Monday the Press published the startling fact that in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and Cincinnati, where over one million were employed twelve months ago in manufacturing industries alone, fully one-third of the industrial population are at present unemployed.

A wonderful statement, Mr. President. Yet if it were limited to one locality, to one town, to one city, to even one State the matter would be small and could be easily handled; but we find upon investigation that it spreads out over the entire country, that one-third of the industrial population of the whole people are unemployed, and that that word of itself means that they are upon the verge of starvation, that the blackness of want in the future is immediately in front of them, gloomy, dismal, forbidding, repulsive.

Unfortunately—

Says the editor a little further along—the existing condition of affairs in the larger centers of industry extends with even greater severity to the smaller cities. The census of 1890 makes the following returns:

Then here is a brief statement showing the number of people usually employed in the cities of Scranton, Troy, Newark, Cohoes, Newburg, and Pittsburg, making a total of 145,350 persons:

	Number employed.
Scranton	8,500
Troy	25,100
Newark	43,300
Cohoes	8,750
Newburg	3,200
Pittsburg	56,500
Total	145,350

Dispatches published in Sunday's Press from reliable and careful correspondents, who have been cautioned against exaggeration, show the following number unemployed:

Here are the figures:

Scranton	5,000
Troy	18,000
Newark	23,000
Cohoes	5,000
Newburg	2,000
Pittsburg	25,000
Total	78,000

A little army; yes, Mr. President, a great army, larger than Grant had at Shiloh. Seventy-eight thousand men and women. That means adult persons, not including the members of their families and those who are dependent upon them.

After making due allowance for other gainful occupations than those reported by the census, we find that fully one-third of the wage-earners in these six cities belong to the increasing army of the unemployed. The destitution in Pittsburg almost surpasses belief.

These statements come from reliable correspondents who were sent to the different towns for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and cautioned not to exaggerate the figures.

In one of the morning papers a few days ago were these startling headlines, "Boston's Big Burden. Leading Citizens Meet To-day to Plan to Help the Poor. Statisticians say Forty Thousand Men are Unemployed." Those are the headlines of the dispatch, and I read what follows:

Statistics gathered by Messrs. W. Clarke and R. B. Young, of the Andover House, in thirty-seven crafts, indicate a total number of idle men in Boston of 38,390.

These are only the men, not the women nor those who have been in the habit of doing the work of adults, though of tender years, nor the little ones, the old and decrepit, and the destitute from other causes.

A little further along other persons who attended this meeting, persons who had been specially commissioned to investigate the subject, put the number at 40,000, just as the headline stated: and in the same column of the same paper, from Providence, R. I., reference is made to the condition of things there occasioned partly by striking mechanics and partly by the general situation. I read from that dispatch:

The combination of an extensive and long-drawn out strike and a dull market has produced a depression here much more severe than that from which other cities are suffering. The Olneyville strike is now in its eleventh week, with no prospect of immediate settlement. The strike has thrown idle 8,500 persons; 1,000 jewelers are idle from causes due to general depression, and 1,000 employés of the Corliss Engine Company are out of a job. Here is a total of 10,500 laborers, men and women, in the army of the unemployed at the beginning of winter.

Reading further, we see Paterson and other places mentioned in the same category.

Now we come to Chicago, that wonder of wonders in the march of civilization. The article is headed, "In Chicago's Slums," with a line following in black-face type in these words:

Five-cent lodging houses where chairs take the place of beds.

Going down a few paragraphs, I find these words:

As a matter of fact there are many hundred persons in Chicago every night who can not purchase a lodging for lack of means, and who stay out so late that access to the station-houses is denied because they are already overcrowded. These people will then sleep anywhere. All they want is cover from the night.

That can be had in Chicago for 5 cents. But the lowest tramp, if fortune favored him with a dime, would shrink with horror from lodging in such a place. There are one or two places of the kind in Chicago and they are hard to find. When found they are the very apotheosis of degradation, dirt, and dinginess. Beside the 5-cent places those where admittance is a dime are palaces. For 5 cents the lodger is allowed the privilege of a chair until morning. Simply that and nothing more.

The keepers of such places form the lowest elements of society. They do not treat their patrons as humans nor yet as beasts of the field. The 5-cent wretch becomes an object for blows and kicks. When his nickel enters the greasy pocket that gapes for it he is then an atom of squalor, and he is treated accordingly.

And it goes on to describe one of those despicable places where these poor people are compelled to remain over night and through no fault of their own.

I read another dispatch from Chicago. This is under the date of the 16th instant:

Mayor Swift to-day issued an appeal to the people of Chicago for charity for the poor.

And these are the words that the mayor uses in his appeal:

Some thousands are congregated in cold and unwholsome public buildings, yet many other thousands, in their quiet cottages and apartments, are scarcely less destitute, and with the approaching cold of a long winter the calamity is certain to intensify. This pitiful condition threatens also the health and good order of our beloved city. Desperate men do desperate deeds.

A little further, and the reporter uses this language:

A further investigation shows that there are 5,000 poor girls here on the brink of starvation. A State street store yesterday advertised for ten girls to help over the holidays, and received 600 applications in a few hours.

Then, here are dispatches from Buffalo and other places. I find in one from Buffalo the following paragraph:

Postmaster Stauch has made an estimate of the number of men out of work, basing his calculations on the applications which have been received by him for aid. His figures show that there are between 17,000 and 20,000 men—out of work, and that there are in the neighborhood of 50,000 persons suffering for food and clothing.

That is in Buffalo. It has gone so far, the same dispatch informs us, that many children are necessarily kept from school because of the poverty of their parents and their guardians.

I have here the statement of a reporter in the Chicago Times, referring to the city of Pullman, where one would suppose that thrift and comfort and ease ought to exist, if such things can exist anywhere in a manufacturing community. Yet the reporter goes on to show that even in Pullman wages have been in process of reduction for several years, steadily downward, until now the great need for money is to pay rent with, and the rent charges have been made uniformly high. In Pullman there are men, women, and children at the very door of death from want of food.

I have here a large number of dispatches from other places, but will not stop to read them nor ask even that they be inserted with my remarks. What I have read has been for the purpose of calling attention not only to the vast extent of destitution so far as the degree of want is concerned, but to show the large area that is covered by it.

Now, we come to the capital city of Washington. Here is a short article clipped from the News a few days ago. One paragraph I read:

It is doubtful indeed, if anybody except the police and an occasional newspaper reporter knows how startling is the wretchedness that lurks in the slums and purlieus. Even members of charitable organizations do not penetrate these depths; they are reserved for the eyes of the guardians of the law and for the men to whom the varying phases of life are an incessant practical study.

Here is something from the Washington Star. I read a paragraph from an article printed in that paper a few days ago:

The poor districts of the city are larger than one unfamiliar with the subject is likely to suppose, and the character of the poverty is worse than one can imagine who has not been through the dog-kennel houses, where six families live in a four-room house; where one's feet sink through the holes in the rotton floors, and where the smoke-covered walls are so thick with vermin that the investigator hesitates to return to the bosom of his family without first submitting to the kind offices of the Turkish bath attendant.

* * * * * * *

But it is in the outlying districts, where the squalid tenements cover whole blocks and square miles, that the suffering is greatest and where the sufferers can depend least on each other, all being in the same state.

And so the terrible danger spreads. Instances might be multiplied many times, and among the strange and cruel incongruities that appear about the situation, I find a New York dispatch in the Washington Post of November 25, introduced by the following words in glowing black headlines: "Money for the asking." "It is remarkably easy now in Wall street banking houses. Stock market brightens."

The dispatch goes on to show that there are $76,000,000 and upward of idle money in the banks of New York over and above their lawful reserve. I do not refer to that fact, however, at this time for the purpose of criticising the banks or saying anything about Wall street, but to impress upon the Senate the thought that in connection and contemporaneous with this wonderful and extraordinary distress we have a large amount of unused money. The great trouble is to get to it when it will do good.

In view of these things, Mr. President, the question logically arises, what are we going to do about this situation? What can we do? For the purpose of breaking the ice in this body I have prepared this bill. It is not a bill containing many provisions. It is not complicated by much machinery. It provides that the governor of any State or Territory, if destitution in his State exists to a degree beyond the capacity of the local authorities to handle, and he will appoint three competent persons of different political affiliations in that State to receive and distribute any funds that the Government may see proper to donate to the State for that purpose, and will so signify to the President of the United States, the President shall appoint the gentlemen named as national relief commissioners, and the Secretary of the treasury is authorized to issue and to deliver to the treasurer of the board one-fourth of the total sum which may in the end be used for that purpose, provided the first one-quarter or the second one-quarter or the third one-quarter is not sufficient, and the total amount appropriated for the entire purpose as I put it in the bill is $6,300,000, which was a mistake of mine.

It was intended to make it $63,300,000; and if anyone curiously disposed would estimate how far that would go in taking care of 3,000,000 men who are represented to be out of employment now—so estimated by the most careful statisticians, those in position to be best informed—he will see that if we give to each one of them as much as we are in the habit of paying on an average to the convicts in our State prisons, 50 cents a day, it would be $1,500,000 in a single day to these 3,000,000 persons. Continue it thirty days and you have $45,000,000, and if you continue it sixty days you have $90,000,000.

The bill is drawn upon the supposition and the expectation that the States and the cities and the localities where suffering exists will, as they always have done and as they are doing now, use all the means within their power to relieve the distress, and that a very large part of this donation, if it should be appropriated, would never be used. In many instances I doubt, even though the appropriation were made to-morrow, whether a dollar of it would be accepted at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 2 o'clock p. m.). The Senator from Kansas will please suspend. The morning hour having expired it is the duty of the Chair to order the first case on the Calendar to be called.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Calendar may be temporarily laid aside that the Senator from Kansas may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Calendar may be laid aside that the Senator from Kansas may proceed with his remarks on the pending bill. There is no objection, and the Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER. And there are no expenses involved in the operation of this measure; that is to say, the machinery which is provided is such as would operate through channels already in existence. Every city to-day has its relief organization. Then there are a thousand and one private associations, bodies of men and women who are always ready to volunteer their services on such occasions as these—the same class of women who came to us in the times of war and helped us there. They are ready; they are thoroughly organized, and they are competent, reliable persons.

The instant that a bill like this should have the approval of the President its provisions would be telegraphed broadcast and be printed in the next morning's papers, and every officer of every organization, whether private or municipal, would be ready to perform the work that would be intrusted to him. One of the provisions of the bill is that the relief commissioners to whom the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver funds shall in their discretion turn over such portions as might be deemed best to the classes of officers I have just named, so that there will not be a dollar of expense attending the practical operation of the bill.

Mr. President, the bill provides how the funds shall be raised, and that is a very simple process. It would not require the use of a dollar that is now in circulation. It would not require the use of a dollar that anybody seems to have use for. It requires, first, that all the silver dollars now lying idle in the Treasury not covered by certificates shall be used; and, second, that for the rest the Secretary shall immediately proceed to coin the silver bullion that is in the Treasury into silver dollars and use that. That would be a good way to get this silver into some useful line of duty.

I am aware of the objections which are urged to this class of legislation upon the part of many public men, that the Constitution provides for nothing of the kind. Indeed, some gentlemen go so far as to urge that it is in violation of the provisions of the Constitution. I shall not stop now to argue that point. I wish only to call attention to two or three simple propositions in connection with it. First, that there are a great many duties, a great many powers, a great many privileges, which we enjoy and which are conceded to us by common consent, that are not mentioned in the language of the Constitution; second, that there are a great many implied powers which are sometimes necessary to be called into requisition in the execution of powers expressly granted; and third, that there are a great many incidental powers which are nowhere either mentioned or alluded to in the Constitution—incidental powers of Government, powers which lie dormant in the meaning of the word "sovereignty," powers which any organized people may exercise, powers which sometimes are necessary in the execution of a great responsibility incumbent upon men and upon Governments.

There are great occasions, Mr. President, when nations, communities, and individuals may call to their aid powers which, under ordinary circumstances, are not known to exist. It is like the case of a man striking in his own defense or of his leaping to the rescue of a friend in danger, or of one picking up his enemy by the wayside and doing good to him.

It is too late now, Mr. President, in the history of this grand people to say that we dare not do anything of this kind. Upon an examination of the record it will be found that there are many instances where the Congress of the United States has gone to the relief of suffering people in different parts of the country.

I wish to avail myself of this opportunity, lest I do not have another so good a one, to say that I have been aided very much in the collection of these facts by Mr. Amzi Smith, in charge of the Senate document room, a man whose learning, whose knowledge of his business, whose courtesy, whose promptness, whose untiring industry are worthy of a life-long position under the Government, and when old age creeps upon him, a pension to the end of his days.

Beginning with 1803, Congress voted aid to sufferers by fire at Portsmouth, N. H., and the next year like aid was granted to sufferers from like cause at Norfolk, Va. In 1812 Congress appropriated $50,000 to sufferers by an earthquake in Venezuela. In 1815 an indefinite sum was appropriated—how much was finally paid I have not had time to ascertain, and it does not matter—an indefinite sum was appropriated to sufferers by earthquake at New Madrid, in Missouri Territory. In another instance in 1836, an indefinite sum was appropriated to sufferers by fire in the city of New York; in the same year to sufferers by Indian depredations in Florida an indefinite sum.

At another time, $20,000 to sufferers from a like cause at Alexandria, Va.; again, in 1847, for transporting supplies to the people of Ireland an indefinite sum. We not only have gone to the rescue of our own people, but we have reached out our friendly hands to brethren on the other side of the water and have offered assistance there.

In 1863 Congress voted $200,000 to sufferers by Indian depredations in Minnesota; the next year $2,000 to sufferers by an accident at the arsenal in the District of Columbia; in 1866 an indefinite sum to sufferers by fire at Portland, Me.; in 1867 an indefinite amount for transportation of supplies to people in the Southern States, and for a similar purpose in 1867 another large amount. Where I use the word "indefinite" it is so used because I have not been able to ascertain what was the entire amount finally used. In the same year a direct appropriation was made for the use of sufferers in the South; the same year another appropriation of $50,000 was definitely made for the same purpose; again, in 1868, for the same purpose, an indefinite sum; in 1871, for transportation of supplies to France and Germany—what that was for I do not remember—and in 1872 to sufferers by fire at Chicago. Senators will remember that upon that occasion there were a great many army tents used and soldiers were placed on duty there under the immediate command of Gen. Sheridan. There was a large amount of money appropriated and Government property was used, besides the active presence of the Army in the case of that great fire.

In the same year a sum was appropriated to reimburse the postmasters at Chicago for losses. That might come under the head of legitimate appropriations, or appropriations under legitimate legislation, even in the face of criticism. In 1874 $190,000 were appropriated at one time to sufferers by the overflow of the Mississippi River, and at another time an indefinite sum for same purpose. In 1875 seeds amounting in value to $30,000 were distributed among persons who had been rendered destitute by raids of grasshoppers; the same year $150,000 was appropriated for a like purpose. In 1877 and in 1878 additional sums were appropriated, but these last two instances involved a very small outlay. In 1877, in the case of yellow fever in the South, $200,000 were appropriated.

There were a number of other cases. I shall not refer to any more of them, but will ask that the paper from which I am reading, in its tabulated form, may be inserted as an appendix to my remarks, and I shall not detain the Senate longer than to make a very brief summing up.

I think that the Senate ought to take some action upon this bill, more than to simply refer it to the Committee on Education and Labor, where I expect to ask that it be referred when I conclude my remarks; that there ought to be a report made upon it, and that promptly, whether yea or nay or by way of amendment.

I know that some Senators will argue that this subject is beyond the province of national legislation. Perhaps it is, Mr. President, but if it is, let the people understand it. The time is coming, in my opinion, when for all such purposes as this State lines must be utterly abolished. We never thought about State lines when we wanted to help the poor people who were in trouble in Portsmouth, or in Portland, or in Boston, or in Chicago or in Memphis, or in Savannah, or in New Orleans, or even across the water in Ireland. We paid no attention to State lines, nor even to the lines of our national boundary, in such cases, nor ought we; and if we are going to stand in such a case upon that doctrine, let us know it, so that the people in the course of events in the next few years—for we do not know what is coming—may amend our Constitution accordingly.

I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that for a moment. I wish to have passed a little measure which was up for consideration the other day, and which will not take much time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion?

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not withdraw his motion. There are some matters in executive session which ought to be attended to.

Mr. CAMERON. The executive business, I think, will not detain the Senate in executive session more than a few minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator will not withdraw his motion for an executive session.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR, that the message of the President of the United States on relations with Hawaii be referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR moved that the message of the President of the United States in relation to diplomatic representation in Hawaii, transmitted in response to the resolution of the 6th instant be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed.

Ordered, That the consideration of the motion be postponed until to-morrow.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 98) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1893, on the 21st day of said month; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

INCREASE OF CAPITOL POLICE FORCE.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent to call up the concurrent resolution reported by me on the 14th instant from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, proposing to increase the Capitol police force.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Board of Capitol Police be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint twelve additional policemen at an annual salary of $1,100 each, one-half to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the appropriations for miscellaneous items of the respective Houses, until otherwise provided for.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. It is the bill we had up the other day and which was discussed quite freely. It simply proposes to change the method of transmitting notices of postal receipt deposits. It is recommended by the commission and by the Postmaster-General. There is no objection to it on the part of any officer who knows anything about business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALL. I object, if an objection will carry it over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri will not prevail at this time and open up a question which I think ought to be discussed. If I can get a second I shall take the sense of the Senate by yeas and nays upon the motion. The question is whether a number of members of this body can be appointed by the President of an expired Senate to perform duties in this body to the derogation of the committees appointed by the Senate. Here is a bill that has not been referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is reported by what is called a commission. It undertakes to disregard entirely all the Senators upon that committee. A body nominated by the President of the last Senate, members of the present Senate, were appointed to take into consideration subjects that have been committed to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; and it is assumed that the members of that committee are not competent to perform the duties which have been committed to them, one of which is the consideration and recommendation to the Senate of the pending bill.

I can not conceive the propriety of recognizing the power of the presiding officer of a body which has expired and which no longer exists, to designate the members of this body who are to perform duties in it, and that, too, when the Senate has since that time appointed certain Senators here as members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whose opinion they have required this bill and all other amendments and improvements and changes in the postal service to be submitted. How can we recognize an authority of that kind?

Suppose these Senators had been appointed by the President of the last Senate and charged with the duty of considering a tariff bill and changes in the revenue system of the Government or the foreign relations of the country, is it to be supposed that the two great Committees on Finance and Foreign Relations would have submitted to such a designation of Senators paramount to them and to be substituted for them when selected by a policy which is not known in this body?

It seems to me the mere statement of this proposition shows how dangerous it is. The provision was agreed on by the members of a conference committee after the Senate decided adversely to the creation of a commission of this kind. The members on the part of the Senate were appointed by the officer of an expired Senate. Is it proposed that three members of the House and three members of the Senate shall agree upon a provision which shall create a body appointed by an expired authority with absolute power to continue their sessions indefinitely and perpetually, and to draw their warrants upon the Treasury of the United States for any amount of money they may see fit to expend? It does not matter that in this instance that authority would be executed properly, that the Senators and the members of the House who compose the commission are persons in whom the authority may be safely trusted, what is the precedent to be established? That there shall be designated, not by the Presiding Officer of this body, but by the Presiding Officer of an expired Senate, three Senators, who shall have power to incur any expense they see fit to incur, to determine upon the propriety of such expenditure, and draw their warrant upon the Treasury for any amount of money that they see fit to decide is proper and reasonable.

I insist, Mr. President, that this not only an unconstitutional authority, one which can not be created by statute, but that it is full of danger to the institutions of the country, and for that reason I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let the Chair state the pending question before the Senator from Ohio proceeds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see anything in the bill itself that is wrong. It seems to me it would expedite public business and dispense with a good deal of red tape in the passage of vouchers from the Sixth Auditor to the Postmaster-General and back and forth again. Therefore, so far as the proposition is concerned, I think it ought to be adopted. But it is equally clear in my mind that no measure of this kind, involving a good deal of detail and a good deal of technical knowledge, should be acted upon without reference to the regular committee. It seems to me that my friend from Missouri had better let the bill, which no doubt has been fully considered by him, go to a committee. So far as I can understand the subject-matter I approve of the object and the terms of the bill, but it appears to me that when such a measure is introduced from the commission which was organized at the last session of the last Congress it should be referred to the regular committee, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or the Committee on Finance, either of which would have jurisdiction of the subject.

It deals with the mode of keeping accounts and passing vouchers in the Post-Office Department, and although no doubt the gentlemen who were appointed as a commission to inquire into any defects in the modes of business in the various Departments of the Government have satisfied themselves upon the question, yet I think that when the bill is brought here it ought to be dealt with like any other bill; it ought to be referred to the appropriate committee. That certainly would not weaken it, because it proposes to make a very material and a very great change, and I think a favorable change. Still it ought to be examined by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or by the Committee on Finance, and if either committee concur with the commission which has been organized, then as a matter of course we can vote upon it safely.

The commission, I understand, was appointed by an amendment to an appropriation act at the last session of the last Congress, and was rather in the nature of a committee of inquiry. It was a joint committee of the two Houses to inquire into the manner of conducting public business in the various Departments of the Government. I favored such a commission, and would be in favor of it now. I hope that the commission will be continued. But it is a mere committee of inquiry, not a regular committee of the Senate to pass upon an act of legislation. It certainly can not be considered in that light. It was not so considered by me, but rather as a committee of inquiry; and when the commission has made its inquiry and suggests its plans for reforming the public service its report, like any other matter, whether important or indifferent, ought to be referred to a regular standing committee of the Senate. Therefore, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether that course had not better be taken, and that all the measures legislative in their character reported from the commission should take the ordinary course pursued in the consideration of other public measures; that they should be referred to standing committees of the Senate, and, having their sanction, no doubt would then be passed by the Senate without any objection.

It seems to me there is nothing in the point made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. I understand that this bill comes from the other House, and there is not a question of jurisdiction involved. The question is not whether we can pass such a law as is proposed; it is a question of the mode and manner of doing business in the Senate and not a question of jurisdiction. The other House having sent the bill to us we have jurisdiction, and we can pass it nem. con., without reading, or dispense with the ordinary formula in passing bills.

But the question is whether a measure of this kind, of considerable magnitude, involving a vast sum of money, the passing upon $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 of expenditures in the Post-Office Department, should be passed without undergoing the scrutiny of a regular committee. That is the point which it seems to me is weak in the proposition. I think it would be much better to refer the bill to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and if that committee approves it, as it no doubt will, so far as I can understand the measure, then it will pass without any difficulty. Otherwise, it would introduce a new danger into our mode of conducting business. It is unusual to have a joint committee of the two Houses pass upon measures.

Each body is separate and distinct, and as distinctive, separate bodies, with no other connection except the necessity of having the joint action of the two Houses, the bill ought to be considered by an independent committee of the Senate. The committee which passes upon this measure should be composed of members of the Senate, not of the two Houses. A commission organized for the purpose of inquiry only, for the purpose of recommending such methods as may improve the public business, ought not to be armed with the power of reporting laws.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator to make the point—I want to get at it exactly—that a joint committee appointed by Congress has no authority to report a bill for the consideration of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that power ought not to be granted in any case to a joint commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the members who report to the respective bodies are members of that body and under their control. They do not make the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true, but the House of Representatives have no right to report a measure to the Senate of the United States. Here is a commission composed equally of three members of the Senate and three members of the House. That joint committee can not report a bill to this body. It seems to me it would tear up——

Mr. COCKRELL. The three Senators make their report here. It is true it is signed by the members of the commission on the part of the other House. The members of the House make their report there.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a separate and distinct body.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio one question. I had some experience years ago with a commission of this kind, and in the language creating the committee it was directed to investigate and report by bill or otherwise. I agree with the Senator that it is a bad practice to substitute for committees of the two bodies that have special work to do a joint commission, or joint committee; but if in the creation of the joint committee or commission it is declared that part of their duty shall be to report by bill or otherwise, does the Senator from Ohio think then that it would be out of place for them to report a bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I say that this commission might be authorized to report a bill to the Senate, but the question with the Senate would then be, as a separate and distinct body, independent of the House, whether that bill (because the reporting of the bill is simply the expression of the opinion of the commission) should be referred to a separate and distinct committee of the Senate and reported by it before action is taken upon the measure.

Mr. HALE. To be referred to a committee that has cognizance of that kind of business?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, that kind of business.

Mr. HALE. I think there is great force in that view.

Mr. SHERMAN. And while it might delay a little the passage of measures that are advised by the commission, it would still preserve the ordinary forms of parliamentary law, which requires a distinct committee to act upon every measure in either House, absolutely independent of the other. In this case I hope that that course will be pursued. The commission can go on and make their examinations. No doubt they will find many defects to correct. They can report them in the form of a bill or otherwise, and then their recommendations may be referred to the proper committee of the Senate having charge of that class of business.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about the Joint Committee on the Library? That is created by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Joint Committee on the Library is an exceptional committee in this body. It has undoubtedly reported bills, etc., but it deals with very small matters comparatively.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I have been upon the Committee on the Library a great many years, though I am not now. The theory of the Joint Committee on the Library is that it has a twofold authority. The Committee on the Library is a Senate committee pure and simple, and then there are certain statute powers given to the two committees together. But the Committee on the Library has always held (as the Senator I think will agree with me) that it has a right, even if the House members do not attend, to do the same thing that any ordinary Senate committee would do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; it is a separate and distinct committee in each House.

Mr. HOAR. Formerly we would frequently report measures from the Senate Committee on the Library. After having passed the Senate they went over to the House, and there were referred, and the House Committee on the Library passed separately on them, just as the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee would have done, and the measures went through in that way. The two committees have certain joint authority, conferred by statute, principally the control of the library and the public garden here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same is the case with the Committee on Printing. The Committees on Printing of the two Houses have certain joint powers, and they act upon those powers.

Mr. COCKRELL. By whom was that power given?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was given by law.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, the committees were authorized by law——

Mr. COCKRELL. The power conferred upon this commission was given by law, too.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, but both the Committee on Printing and the Committee on the Library have always reported separately to each House as independent committees—not as a joint committee, but as the Committee on the Library or the Committee on Printing of the Senate or the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. This commission reports separately to each House. I reported a similar bill from the commission, and it is upon the Calendar. The other House proposed this bill. The two bills are identical, and I asked that the House bill might be taken up in lieu of the Senate bill. Now, we have made a report to the Senate, and it is printed here. We reported a separate bill to the Senate. The House members of the commission made a report to the House. They reported a separate bill. Those bills were identical. The House passed their bill and it came here and I moved to take it up instead of the one we reported. Now, your Joint Committee on Printing and your Joint Committee on the Library agree upon a bill. The members on the part of the House go and report it to the House. The members on the part of the Senate report it to the Senate. The House passes the bill first. It comes here. Would you not ask the Senate to take up and consider the House bill in preference to the Senate bill? If these committees have the jurisdiction given them by law, what difference does it make whether they are called a committee or a commission? It is tweedledum and tweedledee, it seems to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on the Library and the Committee on Printing have certain executive duties as a joint body. Their action in this respect is not necessarily and not usually reported to either the Senate or the House. They pass upon questions of printing, etc., in the case of the Committee on Printing, and the Joint Committee on the Library controls the action of the Librarian of Congress to a certain extent, but when they act legislatively they are separate committees.

Mr. HOAR. Here is the rule under which the Committee on the Library have power to act jointly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, the Committees on the Library are two distinct bodies, organized one for the Senate and the other for the House, but they are authorized in certain matters to act jointly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator please read the rule, and then I will read the provision of law relating to the commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. The rule providing for the appointment of standing committees of the Senate contains the following clause:

A Committee on the Library, to consist of three Senators, which shall have power to act jointly with the same committee of the House of Representatives.

And that joint action is provided for by a statute of the United States which defines their power. But whenever they report a bill to either the Senate or the House they are separate committees of the two Houses.

Mr. COCKRELL. The law creating the commission reads thus:

That a joint commission, consisting of three Senators, members of the Fifty-third Congress, to be appointed by the present President of the Senate, and three members-elect to the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-second Congress, shall, during the Fifty-third Congress, inquire into and examine the status of the laws organizing the Executive Departments, bureaus, divisions, and other Government establishments at the national capital; the rules, regulations, and methods for the conduct of the same; the time and attention devoted to the operations thereof by the persons employed therein, and the degree of efficiency of all such employés; whether any modification of these laws can be made to secure greater efficiency and economy; and whether a reduction in the number or compensation of the persons authorized to be employed in said Executive Departments or bureaus can be made without injury to the public service: Provided, That the commission herein authorized shall have no jurisdiction to inquire into and report on pension legislation. Said commission is authorized to employ not exceeding three experts, who shall render such assistance as the commission may require in the prosecution of the investigation herein required, and shall receive such compensation as the commission shall determine to be just and reasonable.

The heads of the respective Executive Departments shall detail from time to time such officers and employés as may be requested by said commission in their investigations. Said commission or any subcommittee thereof shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths, and such process shall be issued and such oaths administered by the chairman of the commission or subcommittee, and the commission may report, by bill or otherwise, to their respective Houses of the Fifty-third Congress. All necessary expenses of said commission shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated upon vouchers approved jointly by the chairmen of said commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right, but when that joint commission report to this body that report should then be referred to a committee of the Senate, so as to secure the separate action of each House through organs of its own. The officers of the Senate who make up the Calendar recognize that and use the words "Joint Committee of Congress" instead of "commission." A commission may be employed to do almost anything, and it may be composed of persons outside of the Senate, as commissions have been organized outside of the Senate and outside of the House. Commissions may be organized as experts to inquire into a certain matter; but when it reports as a matter of course its report is referred to the appropriate committee. We had a commission on the tariff, and I believe it was composed partly of civilians and partly of members of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; there were no members of Congress on it. They were all civilians.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were all persons outside of Congress; but they reported in the form of a bill, and that bill was referred to the appropriate committees of each House in its turn.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him right there, before he proceeds to another point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. This joint commission, as it is called in the statute, is a single body, so that if the three members of the Senate and one member of the House of Representatives vote one way, and the other two, being a majority of the members of the House, vote the other way, the commission still would act and make its report. So, on the other hand, if all the members of the House and one member of the Senate had voted one way, the Senate might have something reported to it which a majority of its representatives had dissented from. So there is no body which can be treated as a committee of the Senate, whether it is a part of a joint committee or otherwise. That is one distinction between this case and the case to which the Senator from Ohio referred.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; there is no such distinction existing.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will look at the statute he will see it expressly provided.

Mr. COCKRELL. No report has been made, and no interpretation of the kind given to the language of the statute. Unless the six agree the House does not agree. That is the whole of it. There has been nothing done and no proposition made that a mere majority of the six members shall control the action of the commission. If another Senator and myself were to differ from the third Senator he would not join with the House members in agreeing to what we dissented from.

Mr. HOAR. But the statute is otherwise. Read it.

Mr. COCKRELL. All I want is to accomplish something in this matter. A great deal of time and labor have been given to the investigation of the methods of business. I venture to say that no sane man can affirm that the methods of business in our Executive Departments to-day are what they ought to be. I think the Senator from Ohio will agree with me that there ought to be changes made, and that the methods ought to be simplified. The business of the Departments ought to be brought up to current work. It is a shame and a disgrace to the Government that to-day there are over a million dollars due to the soldiers, their widows and orphans, according to our officials records, and yet we can not adjust and pay the claims, and will not do it. To-day claims for horses lost in the Mexican war are pending in the Treasury Department. So it is in every branch of the service.

Now, the methods of business must be changed, and the business of the Departments brought up to current work, like any other great establishment. We selected, in my judgment, three of the very best men we could have selected in the United States as experts to go through with this work. They are spending their entire time upon it. They go into every branch and bureau; they investigate; they trace the methods of business; they trace every item of business that is done, every entry that is made; they go from one desk to another; and when they have gotten through with all the methods of business they examine the law and the regulations of the Department, and after full consultation they make their recommendation of a change in the method of transacting the business, and show what will be the result of such a change.

In this case the proposition is a very simple one. It is simply a recommendation that the law shall be changed; that the notice of certificates of deposit, instead of being sent to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office, where it accomplishes nothing on earth and is simply delayed there in its transmission to the Sixth Auditor, shall go directly to the Sixth Auditor. That is all there is in this bill.

There is another bill here which has been reported which proposes to change the organization of the Sixth Auditor's office and to change materially the methods of business in the Sixth Auditor's office. That is an important bill, compared with this measure. This is simply a regulation. If it were not for the law, the Postmaster-General would make the change himself, but he can not change the present requirement by order, because the requirement is law.

That is the only reason why this measure is necessary. Many of the changes the experts have recommended have been approved in the Department, and carried out by departmental regulation. Some of them can not be carried out by departmental regulation, and therefore legislation is required. What I want to do is to accomplish something. It is nothing to me; it is for the interest of the public service; it is for the interest of the taxpayers; it is for the interest of Congress that these things shall be simplified and the business of the Departments brought up to current date.

If the business of the Departments were conducted to-day as the great business establishments of our country are conducted, nearly one-half of the labors would be taken off the shoulders of Congressmen. You all know how many letters you are getting about arrears of pay and bounty and deferred pension claims, and on all kinds of business matters. If the work was brought up to current, we should be relieved from that, the business would be in a better condition, and we could always ascertain the exact status of governmental transactions. As it is, we can not. We saw published in the newspapers only a day or two ago that supposed valuable papers had been stolen in regard to money orders and postal notes. The same thing may occur in other matters unless the business is promptly attended to.

The pending bill proposes a very small change. I am not disposed to run contrary to what may be the preference even of a minority of the Senate. I am perfectly willing that everything we report here shall be scanned, scrutinized, and criticised from an enemy's standpoint for that matter. I want action upon the bill. That is all I want.

If the Senate think that these matters ought to go to a committee, I am perfectly willing for them to go to a committee. I have no personal feeling in the matter. I think there is no occasion for the reference. I think that the commission has the right to report by bill, and that it is the business and the duty of the Senate to take up such bills and pass upon them just as if they had been reported by a regular committee, for it has been reported by three Senators, who are a committee as well as a commission, or part of a commission.

It is merely a technicality to raise the question as to how this bill got into the Senate. Suppose a committee which never has had a bill referred to it reports a bill to the Senate and the Senate passes it, has not the Senate jurisdiction of it? Suppose that the Presiding Officer of the body, without anybody ever having presented a bill to him or asking anything of him, should lay before the Senate a bill, that the Senate should take it up and discuss it, that it should be passed and go to the House of Representatives and passed there, would it not be as constitutional a law as if it had been referred to a committee, favorably reported, and passed in the usual way? The Senate, when a bill is before it, has jurisdiction of it beyond any question, and can pass it just as well before it goes to a committee as afterwards if satisfied with the investigation.

If the Senate think it necessary for the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, or if that committee think that their prerogatives have been assumed and intrenched upon and want this bill, let the responsibility rest with them; they may have it; if they want to smother it they can do so, and if they want to report it they can do so.

There is nothing personal in this matter. If a majority of the Senate or any considerable number of the Senate think that bills reported by the commission should go to committees, let them go there, but let the commission be relieved from responsibility.

Mr. VILAS. I will say in respect to this bill that so far as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is concerned, I am quite sure I speak for all of its members when I say that they desire only to discharge their duty according to the usages and methods of the Senate. What belongs to them to consider they ought to consider; what belongs to others to consider, they ought not to interfere with.

The joint commission is not a joint meeting of two committees, one on the part of the Senate and one on the part of the other House, but an independent body by itself, composed of six members appointed, as it happens to be directed by law, three from each of the bodies.

If the Senate desires to have that joint commission perform these duties, well; but they supersede necessarily in that event all of the committees; not alone the Post-Office Committee, but any committee which would naturally have charge of the regulation of affairs of the Treasury Department or any committee which would have charge of the affairs in the Interior Department, and there are various committees to which the various branches of business of the Interior Department properly appertain. This commission supersedes them all if that ground be taken.

However, I was going to ask the Senator from Missouri one question. I would draw his attention to the law as it stands at this time apparently upon the Revised Statutes. Section 407 of the Revised Statutes is the same as section 54 of the revision of the postal laws, which was passed in 1872, and that law now reads simply thus:

SEC. 407. The postal revenues and all debts due the Post-Office Department shall, when collected, be paid into the Treasury of the United States, under the direction of the Postmaster-General; and the Treasurer, assistant treasurer, or designated depositary receiving such payment, shall give the depositor duplicate receipts therefor.

There is, so far as I am aware, no statute which provides for the disposition of those receipts. That is left, as I understand, to the Postmaster-General by regulation; and it is in accordance with the theory upon which all of our postal laws are written. We have no statute which directs anything to be done in the postal service by anybody but the Postmaster-General. The whole theory of our statute is to command one officer to do all the duties, and he is authorized then to regulate the postal service under him and by means of him. The postal service, which is a great express business, is conducted as from a central head, with concurrent action on the part of all the various members of the force, numbering 150,000 men, if you include the clerks in the lower grade offices who are paid by the postmaster instead of out of the appropriation.

The Postmaster-General to-day, under this law, has power by regulation to direct how these receipts shall be disposed of; and I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri if he has considered this question in reference to it. The current payments of the postal service are not made by warrants on the Treasury, as in the case of all the other Departments of the Government, but the ordinary expenditures of the postal service are made by postmasters, under the orders of the Post-Office Department, addressed to the postmaster. Therefore, these orders are as a rule usually addressed to offices which have the deposits. There is a system of collection of the postal revenues by which the smaller postmasters deposit at some post-office known as a depositary post-office, and that office makes the payments of the ordinary expenditures of the postal service.

In order that the Post-Office Department shall know where this money is and upon what post-office to make its orders for the payment of the current expenditures of the postal service, it is necessary that these reports of the various depositing postmasters of the place where they have deposted and the amounts which they have deposited shall be promptly put in the hands of the Postmaster-General, or, more particularly speaking, of his aid in the performance of that branch of fiscal service of the Department, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. Accordingly by regulation each postmaster who makes a deposit is required to make report at once to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, who thus keeps an account from day to day and time to time of the location and distribution of the moneys of the service, out of which the current expenditures are made.

There is another thing. The law requires postmasters to deposit with promptness. In certain cases they are required to deposit weekly, and the Post-Office Department is enjoined necessarily to see that this duty is performed. It is a necessity to the ready distribution of the business.

Perhaps the Senator from Missouri can explain why this provision, which takes from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General the information which he has been in the habit of receiving, will not interfere, but it seems to me that it is liable to interfere and disarrange the ordinary system by which the postal receipts are carried and by which the expenditures of the Department are made. Unless that can readily and satisfactorily be explained, it would strike me to be a reasonable thing that this subject should be inquired into by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the ordinary way in which measures touching the Post-Office Department are submitted to the appropriate committee, and as measures touching every other Department would naturally be sent to the appropriate committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, I wish at some time, before he answers the important question put to him in the preliminary matter which has been discussed, to inquire of him whether this is a commission created by statute, voting by a majority, or whether it is a committee of each House acting concurrently with separate powers? The statute provides for one chairman and gives him authority to administer an oath, and there is no other chairman. Who, in fact, is the chairman of that commission?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a separate chairman for each branch of the commission when the commission is sitting separately; but when the commission is sitting together Mr. DOCKERY, of the other House, is the chairman of the joint commission.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any provision in the statute for the three members of each House to sit separately?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator will find that in the last clause of the statute.

Mr. HOAR. I can not find it. As I understand, this commission and this matter of the chairman presents a very interesting and important question. The commission is just what it would have been if the statute, instead of saying three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives, had said three clerks in the Post-Office Department and three clerks in the Treasury Department. It has no other legal existence whatever except that. It met as one body, and not as two. It voted by a majority of four to two, if the members were all present, without the slightest regard to how that majority was made up, and it had but one chairman as provided for by law.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HOAR. I am not mistaken about that. I am stating the fact with the law before me.

Mr. CULLOM. Each body organized separately.

Mr. HOAR. Then they did not follow the statute.

Mr. CULLOM. Then they appointed a chairman of the joint commission.

Mr. HOAR. That only shows a misunderstanding, as it seems to me, with great deference to other Senators, who may be right and I wrong. The misunderstanding which they exhibit here on the floor of the Senate in the effect of this statute is one which they entertained some time ago.

But the statute provides for a joint commission of three men to be appointed by one power and three by another, and the commission herein authorized shall have such and such jurisdiction. Then there is a provision in the statute about administering oaths, and it provides that they may send for persons and papers, and such process shall be issued and such oaths administered by the chairman of the commission or subcommittee.

Unless the committee of the Senate was made a subcommittee—the commission would have been a very different thing as a joint committee—its chairman could not have administered oaths. There was no such official provided by the statute—one chairman of one body; and that body, and not a subcommittee, have authority given by the law, and nobody else, it seems to me.

So I respectfully submit to my friend from Missouri and my friend from Illinois that they misconceive the effect of this statute if they take any other view of it.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to be becoming very fashionable to report resolutions here creating committees or commissions, for they are substantially one and the same thing.

Mr. President, I confess that when the law under which the commission was created was passed, I thought it was a tolerably awkward piece of legislation, and, as some Senators may recollect, I endeavored to be excused from service on the commission; but it was thought, on account of the provision in the statute requiring the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress at that time to appoint a commission, that if I should decline the vacancy caused by my resignation could not be filled. Therefore I concluded to remain on the commission.

It seems to me that what has been said here is simply sticking in the bark as to what ought to be done. Whatever may be the technical fact, whether this commission has the power to report bills to go upon the Calendar and be acted upon by the Senate or not, unless we abolish the commission and undertake to make this proposed reorganization by some other means, it seems to me that whatever the commission may do in the premises will be thrown away, and what we are undertaking to do now can not be recognized as legitimate and proper.

The commission or committee, or whatever it may be called, has gone to work to try to improve the condition of the Departments in their organization. In the interest of a plain, simple way of doing business and in the interest of economy, we started in that line. We are incurring some expense in it, which the Government will have to pay. If we can not go forward and report bills here to the separate Houses, but if, upon the other hand, the bills we report are to be referred to the committees which have charge of the affairs of the different branches of the Government, the commission might as well be relieved from further service.

Take the pending bill, for instance, or any important bill which goes extensively into the question of the reorganization of the Post-Office Department. If we refer such a bill to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads under those circumstances, of what amount is the work which has been done by the commission? It seems to me that if we have experts and are paying for them, and the Post-Office Committee wants to take charge of the reorganization of the Post-Office Department, the commission had better disband and let the Post-Office Committee take charge of the question, and so of committees which have charge of the business of other Departments.

So I say that the technical objection which is urged here against the reception of a bill in this body and its consideration by the Senate until it has been referred to a standing committee which represents the Post-Office Department, for instance, we might as well adjourn the joint commission and let the committee take charge of that branch of the service.

The commission or committee, or whatever it may be termed, has gone into this work, I may say, with a little more energy and a little greater determination this year in attempting to see if there is not something we can do to improve the condition of the Departments than has been done heretofore.

I know that this reorganization has been going on nominally a great many years, but there has never been before, within my knowledge, that methodical arrangement by which the work can be done as thoroughly and successfully as we have been trying to do it under the joint commission since it has been organized.

So far as this little bill is concerned it is one which has been fully considered by the commission, as has been said by the chairman, for I recognize the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] as the chairman of the Senate wing of the joint commission, for that is what he is as a matter of fact, and he reports the bill here, not the bill which the House branch of the commission reported, but a similar bill. We have considered it, but as the House bill has come over, it is natural enough that we should take up that bill for consideration at this time instead of the other.

I think we ought to settle the question now whether these bills are to go, when the commission report them to the different committees, which will claim whatever bill seems to touch their particular line of official duty. We ought to settle the question whether when we report bills they are to be distributed out to the several committees of the Senate, or whether they are to go to the Calendar, to be considered as they come up in regular order. It seems to me that is the thing we ought to do, because if the commission are to do nothing more than to report bills, I think we are doing a great deal of work and incurring some expense, perhaps, which will amount to nothing to the country. The experts we have employed had better be employed by the several standing committees, and let them take hold of the question of reorganizing the several Executive Departments of the Government and excuse us from the work which we are trying to do under the statute, which, I confess, I have always thought is somewhat of an anomaly.

That is all I have to say about the matter, but it does seem to me that we are sticking in the bark when we technically object to the consideration of this bill and say that it ought to be referred to one of the standing committees before it is acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I think the Senator from Illinois is quite right that the question to determine now is, whether it is proper for the Senate to consider the bills reported from the commission created by the act of the last Congress, without reference to the standing committees of the body.

I do not intend to criticise the action of the commission. I think, from what I have seen—and I have read the reports which have been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with a good deal of care—that they have unquestionably gone on in the right line, with a view to economy and with a view to relieving the Departments from the extra amount of red-tape which is said to exist in the conduct of the business of the various Executive Departments, and I am very glad to have the report of the commission. But I concur with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the commission, created as it was and constituted as it is, ought not to be permitted to bring in bills for consideration by either House of Congress without reference to the proper standing committees.

At the time this commission was created, by the provision which the Senator from Missouri has read in the appropriation act, I objected very strenuously to the appointment of such a commission, to a commission to be appointed by the then presiding officers of the two Houses, consisting of gentlemen who were not members of Congress, who had not taken the oath of office, but who were appointed as individuals, so far as another branch of the legislative department is concerned. It so happened that the three members here were Senators and their terms had not expired, but the others were merely citizens of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were members of the House of Representatives at that time.

Mr. GORMAN. They were members of the House of Representatives-elect, but had not taken the oath of office and were therefore not actually members of Congress. They were simply prominent citizens of the United States, who were, in the course of time, to fill a high station as members of Congress.

The commission met and organized during the recess of Congress, and they employed experts, as the Senator from Illinois has stated—three very distinguished men in the railroad service of this country—whose reports to the commission in regard to the reorganization and change of methods in the Sixth Auditor's Office Senators will find in the RECORD of Friday last, the 15th. It is evident from this report of theirs that their general view is that the accounts and business of the Departments of the Government should be conducted as they are accustomed to seeing the affairs of great corporations managed. They evidently believe that the Treasury Department, which audits the accounts of the Post-Office Department, should have entire charge of the return of postmasters' accounts, and eliminate, as far as possible, all the checks and entries that are made in the office of the Third-Asssistant Postmaster-General. Simply because a few clerks are required to make the entries it is proposed to break up the system practically, which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has described so vividly as to the Post-Office Department. To a certain extent that reform may be right, and I do not know that it is not; but I suggest that before radical changes of this character be made, it is at least wise that the standing committees of this body shall go over the work of the commission and of its experts and report to the Senate in the ordinary way.

Mr. President, how do these bills come here? They come here by the report of a commission—no, not a commission, but the bill pending before the Senate was reported in another place, signed by "ALEXANDER M. DOCKERY, JAMES D. RICHARDSON, and NELSON DINGLEY, jr., managers on the part of the House of Representatives," and "F. M. COCKRELL, JAMES K. JONES, and S. M. CULLOM, managers on the part of the Senate"—precisely as would be done in the case of a conference report. So when the bill came here it was signed in the same way, not only by members of this body as Senators, but by three members of another body.

I submit that the work of a commission of that character, no matter how constituted, whether they be heads of Departments or members of the two Houses of Congress, ought, when received for our consideration, to be properly referred to the committee having charge of the particular subject-matter.

Mr. HARRIS. May I inquire of the Senator from Maryland is there any objection to the provisions of the pending bill?

Mr. GORMAN. I can not answer the Senator positively; but after listening to the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who is very familiar with post-office affairs, who made a suggestion, which occurred to my mind, it is possible that there may be some objection to it, which, however, may be answered fully and completely by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The point I make is that the Senate of the United States should never act upon a bill unless it has been considered by a standing committee or a special committee of its own, or by the body itself without the consideration of a committee, as we are compelled to do in certain cases; but that in general legislation all matters ought to be referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. HARRIS. I interrupted the Senator to ask the question I did for the purpose of suggesting that if a regular standing committee claims jurisdiction of the subject-matter and thinks it ought to have it, as a matter of respect to that committee, if for no other and better reason, I should say give it to them; but if the committee is not demanding the jurisdiction, and there is no objection to the provisions of the bill, it seems to me it is sticking in the bark to inquire into exactly how the bill got on the Calendar or on the desk.

The bill under consideration, I understand, is a House bill. It comes to us as a House bill. It goes to the table as a House bill, and it is certainly a legitimate subject for our consideration as a Senate. If there be objections to the provisions of the bill of course I am willing to consider them.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maryland has for the first time called my attention to an incomprehensible and stupid blunder in the Printing Office in putting in "managers" instead of "members." Nobody on the commission ever thought of signing his name in that way, and the clerks of the respective committees never did it. It is a mistake in the print. I was astounded when he read it. We never signed in that way, and it is a mistake in the print. It was signed "members on the part of the Senate" and "members on the part of the House." All the reports were signed that way. I never discovered that the word "managers" had been stuck in there.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course I do not know whose fault it was. Probably the Printer is at fault. I believe everything is charged to the Printer that gets wrong in the records. But the point of the case is not whether it is signed as managers on the part of the Senate and managers on the part of the House; it is a commission that was created by law. They are not managers upon the part of the House or upon the part of the Senate, and I agree with the Senator that it ought never to have appeared in the record.

Mr. COCKRELL. I merely want to show the Senator three reports here, two made in the Senate and one in the House, which are signed "members on the part of the Senate" and "members on the part of the House;" and that particular one happened to be signed "managers." Here is another one signed "members."

Mr. GORMAN. Of course I make no point as to whether it was signed "members" or "managers."

Mr. COCKRELL. But it is not the fact that it was signed managers.

Mr. GORMAN. I am glad I called the Senator's attention to it. But, apart from that, I submit that three members of the Senate and three members of the House had no right to sign such a report. Under the law the three Senators had a right to join the three gentlemen in another body and sign it as a commission created by the act so and so. They were simply a commission, as I have already said, and three members at least of the commission had no official position when the commission was created; they were simply citizens of the United States.

The Senator from Missouri knows that I would not reflect upon his work. On the contrary, if he were at the head of the commission, if he could have had the entire charge of it and had brought a bill before the Senate and said after my personal examination and my own control of it I know this is right, the measure would have had great weight with me, and I would not have been on my feet to oppose it after he could give such a personal indorsement to it; but the fact is, as we all know, that in the operation of all such affairs the head of a committee is the man who after all is responsible and is held responsible for the character of the bill that the committee produces and reports.

The members of the committee can aid him, and aid to a great extent, but after all, the careful thought and consideration the measure has received must come from the head of the committee and his clerks and experts. I am not content as a member of this body that the work of a commission whose head is not a member of the body shall pass through unless it undergoes the scrutiny of one of our committees.

The second bill relates to the Post-Office Department and the Sixth Auditor's Office. It reorganizes it, changes the condition as to the postal notes, etc. It is far-reaching and broad in its effects, and is the second of the series that is to come along. It seems to me, with due respect to all the members of the commission, that the series of bills affecting the same service should go before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body, and I make that motion in this case. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM. Does not the Senator think, if these bills are to take that course, it will involve the necessity on the part of the several committees that get them of taking testimony and hearing the experts and going over the work again?

Mr. GORMAN. I think not. Take the bill that is found in the RECORD of December 15. There is an important bill where over a hundred thousand dollars are involved. You will find there the report of the experts, the report of the commission, the statements of the Post-Office Department officials, and so on. I do not suppose for one moment that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would be required to go through all the detail again. They can revise what the commission have put in a concrete form.

Mr. CULLOM. I apprehend the Senator will find that if the several committees get the several bills and the commission continues its labors, those committees will be required, in order to satisfy themselves in their own judgment, to send for the same men and to go through the same investigation with the Post-Office Department and the Treasury Department and every other Department of the Government, or else their work will fail and everything that we have done will fall to the ground.

Mr. GORMAN. I will ask the Senator from Illinois, who is a member of the commission, what would prevent the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads from getting all the evidence and all the testimony and the data which the commission have?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course they could get it by having before them the experts, the Post-Office employés, the Postmaster-General, and all those persons; but the very purpose of the creation of the commission was to concentrate the work into a few hands, so that it would be accomplished and one general outline of government would be mapped out, and one reform would work properly with another.

Mr. GORMAN. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that I have not the slightest disposition to delay the good work of the commission. I have no doubt a great many of the suggestions they have made after the labor they have given to the subject will bear good fruit. I trust such will be the case; but I think it is too serious a matter to attempt to change the business of any one of the Departments without the most careful consideration, and I think it ought never to be done without a reference of the matter to a standing committee of this body.

Not only is that true in this case, but in another matter on which we are divided politically. Only a few days ago, on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], when a bill had not been, as Senators on the other side thought, before the proper committee of this body, I as one member of the body said "that is right." We ought to have each of the measures properly considered by the committee that has full charge of the subject. A delay of a few days can not make any difference.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am personally concerned I have no feeling about this matter. The only thing that occurs to me in connection with it is that we are going to duplicate labor and duplicate expense, and probably the whole thing will break down and nothing will be accomplished. I shall be very glad to be relieved of any necessity to do anything in connection with the joint commission, but the commission started in in good faith to do the work. It has already done a good deal; it has already incurred a considerable expense; and it thought that it was getting at the very inner organization of the Departments. The commission thinks that we can save a great deal of unnecessary labor, a great deal of unnecessary expense, and improve the mode of doing the business of the Departments. The thing I fear is that if it is scattered out and the several standing committees, which I recognize as thoroughly able to do all this work, do not go into it as thoroughly as the commission has been doing, the chances are that much of the proposed legislation will fail. That is the only point that I am concerned about.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Maryland if he desires to have the bill referred to one of the standing committees of the Senate that he select the proper committee. I do not think he has selected the proper committee in the motion which he has made. The Senate has a standing committee on the Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. This bill has reference to two of the Departments and their methods of business, to wit, the Post-Office Department and the Treasury Department. The committee I have named was created for the purpose of investigating and becoming informed of the methods of business and the conduct of business in the Departments.

It seems to me that if we are to establish the precedent of having all the bills which the commission may bring in and the reports which the commission may make to the Senate and to the House referred to a committee they had better go to the committee the Senate has established for considering the character of subjects which will be embraced in the bills. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that it would be better, if he insists upon the motion to refer, to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

Mr. CALL. There is no doubt, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is right. There is nothing in my observations thus far which contravenes the position which he took. A House bill comes properly before the Senate. Certainly it may be considered in the discretion of the Senate without reference to a committee. Any Senator may move to proceed to its consideration. Senators who are members of this anomalous body called a commission may do so.

Therefore, this House bill is properly before the Senate for consideration, but there are a great many other questions which arise in this case, pertinent to the consideration of the House bill, which ought to be considered by the Senate. What are they? In the first place, the question as to the propriety of a statute of the United States giving authority to the Speaker of an expired House to designate members of a coming Congress who are to perform legislative duties, in view of the respect due to the members of the committee or committees who are specially charged with that work.

Here are the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, constituted by the Senate. What is it to say by a statute of the United States that a Speaker of an expired House and the President of the expired Senate shall have authority to designate other Senators than those who compose those committees to perform their work? Why should other Senators be selected instead of those upon those committees? Why should the Senators who are assigned to perform these duties, after the Senate refused to approve the provision in the appropriation bill providing for a commission, be detached from the performance of the duties and others assigned to perform them?

That is one consideration. But what is the authority for it? Where do you get the authority for the Congress of the United States to enact a statute by which any other body than the existing Senate and the existing House shall designate the members who are to perform a duty? You speak of this as a commission. Let us see how it can be a commission. Its duties must be either legislative, executive, or judicial. Let us consider them. What are they? To examine into the conduct of the Executive Departments and to recommend measures to be passed by the two Houses. Is that a duty which can be committed to any other authority than the members of the two Houses? Let us see. The Constitution of the United States says the President of the United States "shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." What did this commission do? They were appointed to consider the whole range of the Executive Departments, to take evidence, and to perform the duty of the President of the United States to recommend measures to Congress. As a committee of this body they may consider any measure which may be introduced here and report it to each House, but have they authority to recommend measures to Congress? Is not that a duty expressly given in the words of the Constitution to the President of the United States?

Again, "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." If it be a rule of proceeding of this House as to the manner in which a measure shall be introduced, as to the consideration which it shall have, and the method of its consideration, how can a statute of the United States give to the two Houses authority to prescribe unbending rules of proceeding for either? "Each House may determine." Has not the Senate determined that in the assignment of a Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, a Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, a Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment?

Has not the Senate in this Congress decided that the Senators upon those committees shall have the consideration of these matters? The question is raised, and we are met by certain Senators who say, "I was assigned to perform that duty by the President of the last Senate." The members who report to the House say, "I was assigned by the Speaker of the last House to perform this duty, which the present Senate and the present House of Representatives in this Congress have conferred upon you, and I claim the right to do it."

Mr. President, it seems to me that nothing is clearer than that all legislative power is given to Congress. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. All executive power is given to the President of the United States, and express provision is made that he shall recommend to Congress the measures which in his opinion are advisable to be passed. If this be a legislative duty it can not be assigned by the President and the two Houses of Congress to particular Senators in coming Congresses. Let us suppose that the statute had provided that the President of the expiring Senate and the Speaker of the expiring House should have the authority to designate certain members of the two Houses who should consider the entire subject of our fiscal relations and our system of finance, tariff, and otherwise, and this body had afterwards appointed its committee, would the Senator from Ohio and the members of the Committee on Finance have submitted to that action?

Would it not have been a declaration that they were incapable of performing their duty; and would it have had any validity as a matter of constitutional law? The question would be at once asked, Where is the power given to the United States by a statute, by an act of the two Houses to be approved by the President, to determine the rules of proceeding of each House? The phrase "each House" means the existing House, not the past House, nor the past Senate, nor the preceding President of the United States, but each separate body then existing. Beyond all question that is true. If they and they alone can determine their rules of proceeding what rule is there for any other conclusion in regard to it? It seems to me perfectly clear that each House separately may and must determine the rules of its proceeding.

Senators speak of joint commissions and joint committees. There is no authority in any House or in any Senate to impose a duty upon the members of the other body. The joint committees meet voluntarily. You may provide for the creation of a committee, and it may be said it may sit jointly with a like committee on the part of the other House, but you can not command it to do so. You can not command the members of the other House; and the other House can not command or make the members of this body members of a committee here. It must be voluntary. Each House may give its sanction to their sitting in joint committee, but the rule of the Constitution is plain: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," and it must determine it; and it can not by any possibility communicate any portion of its authority or power to the members of another House.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say that this is a matter of the most extreme importance, and it does not touch the question of the merits of the bill. The bill may be good or it may be bad. That is not the question. It does not concern us to know whether it is good or whether it is bad. By the custom and the rules of the Senate, bills coming here from the other House are referred, unless good reason is shown to the contrary, to the standing committees of this body for their consideration and their opinion.

I have a resolution here touching these questions which I have presented as reasons why the bill should not be hastily hurried through, and this commission vested with the entire authority of the Senate and everything they do approved. Why should we not say now that this method of proceeding is an unconstitutional and unlawful one?

I have a resolution here touching upon these questions and declaring the commission to be entirely void and without authority, first, because it is trespassing upon the executive power of the President of the United States, who alone can recommend to Congress measures of any kind; and, second, because it is an unjust and dangerous precedent to give to three members of the House and three members of the Senate authority, in their discretion, to employ any number of persons to revise the entire civil service of the United States, to supersede the committees of this body, to determine their own expenses and draw their warrant upon the Treasury of the United States for any amount of money that they may see fit in their discretion to demand.

Now, it does not matter that the Senators and the Members of the House who compose this extraordinary body called a commission are men of the highest character. That does not touch the question. It does not matter whether the bill they have introduced here may or may not turn out to be an important bill, but the precedent is itself a dangerous one, and an unlawful one, and one that opens the door of the Treasury to any amount of possible improper use.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is very evident that this important question, which I am convinced should be discussed fully in all its bearings, will not be disposed of to-night; and therefore, if the Senator in charge of the bill has no objection, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 20, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications.

COMMERCE PASSING THROUGH ST. MARYS FALLS CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers submitting a report in reference to commerce passing the St. Marys Falls Canal, Michigan, during the season of 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN P. BAILEY VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of fact of the court in the case of Benjamin P. Bailey vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DAVEY, until after the holidays.

To Mr. LAWSON indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] states that he has a privileged resolution which he desires to offer. The Clerk will report the resolution in order that the House may see whether it is privileged or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from the message of the President, this day communicated to Congress, that an attempt has been made recently by the executive department of the Government to effect a change in the territorial limits of the United States without any consultation with the House of Representatives, and without making any stipulation or provision for obtaining the consent of this House to such change: and

Whereas it is essential to the stability and safety of this Government that the powers and duties of this House on all matters and proceedings involving any change in the limits of the United States, either by acquisition or by cession of territory, be ascertained, settled, and defined, that they may be at all times asserted and defended: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the rights, powers, privileges, and duties of the House of Representatives on all questions and proceedings affecting or involving the territorial integrity of the United States and to report their conclusions as to the nature, extent, and character of such rights, powers, privileges, and duties, together with such recommendations for the assertion and defense of the same as to the committee may seem proper and expedient.

Mr. COCKRAN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York desire?

Mr. COCKRAN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee an Rules.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I desire not to lose the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman propose to investigate simply what took place and was completed nearly a year ago, and to refuse to investigate that which has taken place recently and is as yet undetermined, in relation to this same question?

Mr. COCKRAN. That is precisely what the gentleman proposes to do. I propose to test the constitutional powers of this House, which are not involved in any recent proceeding.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to that resolution, or a substitute for it.

[Confusion in the Hall].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask gentlemen to be in order.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I desire to offer as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] submits the resolution which has just been read, and moves that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, and on that motion he demands the previous question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that, under the rule, that resolution goes to the Committee on Rules, and therefore that the motion of the gentleman from New York to refer it and the demand for the previous question are unnecessary.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the Speaker holds that, I am content.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It goes to the Committee on Rules as a matter of course, and, under the rules, it goes without debate.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is a resolution to raise a special committee, and the Chair is inclined to think that under the rules of the House, when the point is made against its consideration, even though it is privileged it must be referred to the Committee on Rules, because there is an express provision of the rules to that effect. The rules provide——

Mr. COCKRAN. If the Chair holds the point of order well taken I am content.

The SPEAKER. One moment——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, by Rule XI all proposed legislation touching the order of business goes to the Committee on Rules, and it has been held repeatedly that a resolution raising a committee goes to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Clause 51 of Rule XI provides that:

All proposed action touching the rules and joint rules and order of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

This is a proposition to raise a special committee——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, if the demand for the previous question is voted down will not the resolution be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds, under the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky, that this resolution must be referred without a motion; and it will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to send to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine states that he desires to offer a privileged resolution. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the executive communications just read to the House clearly disclose that the rights and dignity of the House of Representatives as a coordinate branch of the Congress of the United States have been invaded by the executive department in furnishing secret instructions to a minister plenipotentiary of the United States to conspire with the representatives of a deposed and discredited monarchy for the subversion and overthrow of the established republican government to which he was accredited and to which his public instructions pledged the good faith and sympathy of the President, the Government, and the people of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that any intervention by the Executive of the United States, its civil or military representatives, without authority of Congress, in the internal affairs of a friendly, recognized government to disturb or overthrow it and to aid or abet the substitution or restoration of a monarchy therefor, is contrary to the policy and traditions of the Republic and the letter and spirit of the Constitution and can not be too promptly or emphatically reprobated.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I make the point of order that that is not a privileged resolution and should be referred to a committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make the further point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman——

Mr. DINGLEY. Is nothing privileged if offered on this side of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] makes the point of order that this resolution is not privileged. What is the point of the other gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The point of order I make is that this resolution must go under the rules to the Committee on Foreign Affairs without debate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The question is first on the point of order raised by me that this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Upon that point of order I desire to address the Chair. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that in accordance not only with the usage and the rules of the House of Representatives, but under the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States, this resolution involves a question of the very highest privilege that can be submitted to this House. It is not a question of personal privilege, as has been erroneously stated. It is a question of the privileges of the House of Representatives as a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States.

The resolution sets forth the fact that the functions and privileges of this House have been invaded by the executive branch of this Government; and I hold, Mr. Speaker, that excepting alone a resolution of impeachment of the President of the United States, no question can come before this House of so high a privilege as a resolution of the character of that which I have presented.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see how imminent the demand is for action upon the part of this House. It is a matter of public notoriety and the President at last has formally revealed the fact that the Hawaiian situation has become flagrant and liable at any moment to ripen into a condition which may involve this country in war with a friendly power. On the face of the documents read at this desk yesterday, without resorting to any implications or any strained construction—on the very face of those documents, embracing the statements made by the President of the United States and by his Secretary of State for him, there has been precipitated in a friendly country such a situation, under the Executive instructions now in possession of the minister of the United States, that if certain conditions of an unlawful negotiation shall be complied with at any time, or if they have been complied with during the period since we last had direct communication from that country, that minister may take or may already have taken such procedure as to constitute acts of war upon the established Government of Hawaii; and for all we know, under the instructions that have been read to this House, the armed forces of the United States may to-day have their bayonets at the throat of a friendly government, with which, I believe, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country overwhelmingly sympathize to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, here was an American minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, commissioned under the Constitution of the United States by the nomination of the President and the confirmation of the Senate, going to a friendly power, recognized by this Government, recognized by all the other great governments of the earth and having its accredited minister in full recognition at the capital of the United States, and yet while that American minister's public instructions were to present to the President of the Provisional Government of the Hawaiian Islands the assurances of the good will and sympathy of the President, the people, and the Government of the United States, we find that he had secret instructions to report first of all—to whom? To "the Queen!" From beginning to end in that executive communication the President of the United States——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Persists in recognizing that deposed and discredited functionary as "the Queen"——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will suspend.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And this minister was secretly instructed to report first to her and to assure her that the President of the United States intended to restore her——

The SPEAKER. The rules require that a gentleman called to order must suspend his remarks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suspend as the rule requires.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I made the point of order that the resolution of the gentleman from Maine was not a question of privilege; but the gentleman is now discussing the merits of the whole question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ought to be allowed to make my statement before the gentleman from Kentucky makes a counter-statement.

The SPEAKER. The point which the gentleman from Kentucky makes is the question pending—whether the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine is privileged.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly, Mr. Speaker, the point that I am arguing.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that the gentleman from Maine does not confine himself to the question of privilege presented.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have endeavored, Mr. Speaker, to confine myself strictly within the rule. It was necessary to cite certain facts in order to substantiate the question of privilege that I present. But I will endeavor to proceed under the admonition of the Chair, and try to confine myself absolutely and solely to the question.

I hold, sir, that the resolution presents a question of the highest privilege, because it is the imperative duty of the Congress of the United States, whose authority in such questions is paramount—whose paramount authority has been officially, but reluctantly, recognized by the Executive—I hold that it is our bounden duty at the earliest practicable moment to disavow and discredit and reprobate a public policy, unconstitutional in its inception, unpatriotic in its spirit, of gravest danger to the public interest, and calculated to bring the United States into discredit with the rest of the civilized world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I say that for the House of Representatives to fail to exercise its constitutional prerogatives in this regard, that for the House to fail to recognize this as a question of the highest privilege, involving a duty of prompt and decided action upon the part of the House, is to abdicate its constitutional functions and bring the legislative department of the Government not only under the disrespect of our own people, but into the contempt of civilized mankind. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ENLOE. I make the point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). I care not, sir, whence this invasion of the authority of the Congress emanates——

Mr. ENLOE. I have called the gentleman to order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I care not from what political party such Executive offense may come. I care not whether this shameful policy was originated by a renegade Republican or a Democratic usurper. It makes no difference to me.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman is certainly not discussing a question of privilege now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I claim that the constitutional rights, the dignity, and the most sacred privileges of this House have been invaded, and that an exigency is presented in which, without prompt action on our part, we may be plunged into war with a foreign government, to avoid which——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been called to order.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). We should adopt the resolution declaring here the voice and sentiment of the American people which has been heard through all the land, from one end of it to the other, in condemnation of the conspiracy to overthrow a friendly Government and reëstablish a deposed and degraded monarchy.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ENLOE. What about the question of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). I deny that the press of the country have "misrepresented" or "exaggerated" the sentiments of the American people on this subject, as charged by the President in his extraordinary message.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will desist. The gentleman from Tennessee renews the point of order that the gentleman does not confine himself to the question of privilege presented.

The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the fact that the simple question presented here is whether this resolution constitutes a question of privilege. That is the simple, naked question with which the House has to deal.

Of course it is difficult for the Chair to decide exactly when a gentleman is transgressing the rules in the discussion of such a question. That must be left largely to the good sense and the spirit of right and justice of the member himself. If members of the House do not themselves resolve to support and maintain the dignity of the House and observe its rules it is difficult for the Chair to do so.

The gentleman from Maine, the Chair thinks, should confine himself, in the discussion of this matter, strictly to the question that has been raised, that is to say, whether this resolution presents a question of privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Chair permit me to ask him this question: Whether it would be a question of privilege if, for instance, a member rose in his place and presented a resolution for the impeachment of the President?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then will the Speaker kindly inform me wherein a resolution of impeachment can be a question of privilege, and this resolution, expressing the views of the House in regard to the invasion of its constitutional prerogatives by the Executive, can come under any other classification than that of a question of high privilege?

Mr. MOSES. What prerogative of the House has the Executive invaded?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have endeavored to state that I think——

Mr. MOSES. The gentleman has not stated it.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). To the comprehension of almost all the intelligent members of the House. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Chair is not entirely clear on the subject——

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the Chair will permit me one moment——

The SPEAKER (continuing). But the Chair will resolve the doubt in favor of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and will hold that this is a question of privilege, and refer it, under the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker—— [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.] I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to ask the Chair if a resolution involving a question of high privilege must be sent to a committee? I call it up for present consideration, as a question of high privilege, for the immediate consideration of the House. And before the Chair rules I desire to call his attention to the fact that in the history of this House there are repeated instances where resolutions of this character have been presented and have been immediately acted upon by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state——

Mr. BOUTELLE. It will manifestly defeat the whole object of the resolution if it is referred and smothered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. It will not be smothered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee will report very soon; but there will not be that haste which was used last January in relation to annexation proceedings connected with Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] of course will understand that business must be transacted in the House in accordance with the rules adopted for its transaction. A question may be privileged, and yet, if there is an express rule of the House which provides that it must be referred to one of the committees of the House, the present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that where the point is made it must go to the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. But, Mr. Speaker, is that the case when it is determined to be a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. This is a resolution concerning——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, bear with me one moment——

The SPEAKER (continuing). Concerning the relations of this Government with foreign governments.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Speaker bear with me for one moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to complete his statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to present——

The SPEAKER. This is not an open question. The Chair will cite a former decision, if the gentleman will give him an opportunity.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I make the point that the question has been decided.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The very essence of these resolutions is to call for immediate action, based upon a plain and universally recognized public exigency. It seems to me that reference to a committee will defeat the primary object of the resolutions themselves.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. Why, this is not a new resolution. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has pending a similar resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs several days ago.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That resolution, which disappeared into the Committee on Foreign Affairs some two weeks ago, is not the same resolution which I have presented. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If the House will permit the Chair to discharge the duties which the rules impose upon him he will do so. The Chair declines to hear any gentleman until he has discharged the duty that the rules impose upon him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats—all gentlemen. Business can not be transacted except in an orderly way. The Chair will state again that, although a question may be privileged, yet if there is a provision of the rules requiring its reference to a committee, it must be so referred.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is there any rule requiring a privileged motion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair appeals to the gentleman to permit the decision to be made, and then any gentleman dissatisfied with it has his right of appeal to the House. Although the question is privileged, yet if the rules provide for its reference it must be referred. There is no question of higher privilege than the right of a member to his seat, yet the rules provide that all matters touching the right of a member to his seat shall be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Now, it has been held expressly that where a matter is called up in the House, not having been referred to the Committee on Elections, touching the right of a member to his seat, that when the point is made it must be referred to the Committee on Elections. The Chair is aware of one decision in conflict with this, but the Chair thinks that a moment's reflection will satisfy gentlemen that it is within the power of the House to make rules for its own government, to make rules for the transaction of business, to make the rules which will cover privileged questions as well as questions not privileged.

The House has determined by its rules that as to certain matters they shall be referred to certain committees. Now, if a privileged matter should arise in the House or be presented to the House and there was nothing in the rules providing for its reference to any committee, then the Chair is of the opinion it would be in order to consider it, or be in order to move to refer it to some committee, thereby giving the committee jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Such questions frequently arise where there is no express direction in the rules as to the reference of the matter to a specific committee. The resolution, however, of the gentleman from Maine relates to our foreign relations, and there is a distinct provision in the rules that all matters referring to our foreign relations shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and the gentleman from Kentucky made the point that this matter should be so referred.

Now, that the House may understand that this determination of the Chair is not governed by any political consideration, the Chair desires to call the attention of the House to a decision made by the present occupant of the chair during the extra session, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEADOCK] presented papers relating to the seat of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LINTON] and some gentleman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] perhaps, made the point that those papers must be referred to the Committee on Elections. The present occupant of the chair held that, although it was a question of the very highest privilege, and that the Constitution of the United States provided that this House must determine the right of a member to his seat, and that every member had a right to a speedy determination of his membership, that the rules provided that such matters should be referred; and the Chair directed that the matter be referred to the Committee on Elections. The Clerk will read the ruliug of the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Speaker kindly state for what reason he proposes to refer this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the rules of the House all memorials, petitions, and private bills may be introduced and referred to the various committees by handing them to the Clerk. If it be a public bill, it is introduced by handing it to the Speaker or to the Clerk at the Speaker's table. Any memorial or resolution relating to the right of a member to his seat is a privileged matter. Any matter that is privileged may be presented or called up when no matter of a higher privilege is before the House. For instance, a committee not authorized to report at any time can only report when the committees are called for reports. A committee authorized to report at any time need not necessarily report when the committees are called for reports, but it may make its report, as was done by the gentleman from Maine this morning, by presenting it at any time as a privileged matter.

Now, the Chair is of the opinion that any matter relating to the right of a member to his seat is privileged. It has always been so held. Therefore the Chair does not think it is necessary to present a memorial of that character through the Clerk. The question raised here, the one presented by the pending proposition, is whether it is in the power of the House, on objection being made, to proceed to consider the resolution, or whether, the point being made, the whole matter must be referred to the Committee on Elections under the rules.

The Chair believes, when a matter of this sort is presented and the point of order is made against it that it should be referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the matter under the rules of the House, it must be so referred. There is a decision made by the immediate predecessor of the present occupant of the chair which is in conflict with that opinion—the Arkansas case, in the Fifty-first Congress. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] presented a resolution relating to the investigation of the election in Arkansas, and called it up for consideration.

The present occupant of the chair objected, and made the point that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Elections, because, under the rules of the House (although the entire rules had not been adopted and there had been adopted a part of the rules relating to the committees and their jurisdiction) the question presented relating to the right of a member to his seat it must be referred to the Committee on Elections, which had jurisdiction of such questions. It was held by the then presiding officer—I have the decision before me—that as it related to the privileges of the House it need not be referred to the committee, and the House adopted the resolution.

The present occupant of the chair thinks that the provision of the rule is the wiser one, which requires that all matters relating to the right of a member to his seat should be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Any member has a right to present such a memorial as a privileged matter, but when the point is made it must be referred to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Speaker be kind enough to allow me to call his attention to a precedent?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will be very glad to have it go in here. In 1862, during the war, at the time of the battle of Ball's Bluff, when great disaster overtook the Union army, a resolution of inquiry was adopted in the House and sent to the Secretary of War, asking for information as to the circumstances and the responsibility for that disaster. The answer of Secretary Cameron contained a statement that he had referred this matter to the Adjutant-General of the Army, Gen. Thomas, and that he had replied that a compliance with the resolution at that time would, in the opinion of the General-in-Chief, be injurious to the public service.

On the 6th of January, 1862, the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, rose in his place and stated that he proposed to present a question of privilege. He recited the circumstances in connection with the facts, and then went on to say and to argue at length, that the question was so important and so interwoven with the privileges of the House, the House and the Senate being called upon to vote men and money to carry on the war, that it was absolutely necessary for the House to have this information and other information of a cognate character to enable it to legislate intelligently. He therefore presented a resolution, which recited the inquiry of the House, the answer of the Secretary of War and the Adjutant-General, and declared—

That the said answer is not responsive nor satisfactory to the House, and the Secretary be directed to return further answer.

The matter was taken up immediately, was decided by a vote of the House to be a question of high privilege; it was discussed to the exclusion of all other business until it was adopted by the House on the same day.

The SPEAKER. Was the point made that the resolution must be referred?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not know whether that point was made or not. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But the Speaker is not acting upon a point of order; he states that he is acting under the rules; he states that he is referring it because the rules require him to do so. Now, I beg the Speaker's attention to this further consideration——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear further argument. The gentleman stated that he had a precedent to submit. The Chair has decided the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I want to call attention to the principle that is involved in this precedent, which is that the matter brought up on that occasion did not pertain to any particular committee of the House, just as the matter brought up in this resolution does not pertain to any particular committee. The resolution of Mr. Conkling did not pertain to the Committee on Military Affairs; the question was one of the constitutional rights of the House of Representatives. So this question does not pertain to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; it is a question whether the Constitution of the United States has been violated and the privilege of the House invaded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not understand that the Chair has decided the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What was the decision? [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I understood the Chair to cause some precedents to be read, but what did he decide?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that the recitals of this resolution constitute a question of privilege, and, the point being made that, as the resolution pertains to our foreign relations, it should be referred under the rules to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Chair holds that it must be so referred.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, and Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky simultaneously moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from Kentucky moves to lay the appeal upon the table. The question is upon the latter motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no desire to debate this matter, Mr. Speaker, but only to test the sense of the House on the question whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs has any jurisdiction over this resolution involving the privileges of the House, and whether such a question of high privilege must be referred to any committee without action by the House.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 155, noes 64.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HULL (pending the call of the roll). Mr. Speaker, I was not in when the resolution was presented, and I would like to have it read before voting.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again read.

Mr. HATCH and others objected.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 91, not voting 91; as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois said: I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HITT] is absent on account of the serious illness of a member of his family.

Mr. MORSE. I think I was in the House; but I do not remember hearing my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the House and did he fail to hear his name called?

Mr. MORSE. I can not so state positively; I think I was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must determine the question for himself.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent that I may record my vote. I think I was in the House.

The SPEAKER. The rule declares that the Chair shall not ask unanimous consent in a case of this kind. If the gentleman claims that he was in the Hall of the House and failed to hear his name, of course he has the right to vote.

Mr. MORSE. I can not positively make that statement.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. ABBOTT with Mr. ANDERSON of Iowa.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas with Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

Mr. LOCKWOOD with Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York.

Mr. ELLIS of Kentucky with Mr. WEVER.

Mr. JONES with Mr. SCRANTON.

Mr. DURBOROW with Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut.

For this day:

Mr. NEILL with Mr. HITT.

Mr. EDMUNDS with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. FITHIAN with Mr. CHICKERING.

Mr. CAMINETTI with Mr. BELDEN.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. LAWSON with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, until the 9th of January, 1894.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ANNEXATION OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire unanimous consent to present a resolution, which I ask to have read for information; and then I wish to ask immediate action upon it by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House is in favor of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, and others, objected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOY, for the remainder of the day.

To Mr. SHELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate still further insists upon its amendment No. 6 to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, further disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 2668) authorizing the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to approve postmasters' bonds.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution (H. Res. 98) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1893, on the 21st day of said month.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 165) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Bridger abandoned military reservation in the State of Wyoming; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the House that just as soon as the pending deficiency bill has been disposed of, I will call up for consideration the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill, which has been pending between the two Houses since the adjournment of the extraordinary session of Congress.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 98) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1893, on the 21st day of said month; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be permitted to-day to sit during the sessions of the House.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 4858) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INDEBTEDNESS OF SALT LAKE CITY.

Mr. GOODNIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4449) fixing the limit of indebtedness which may be incurred by Salt Lake City; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 70) to appoint a joint committee to examine and report upon the construction of the Nicaragua Canal; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHATTANOOGA WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS FROM PUBLIC LANDS COMMITTEE.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 338) for the relief of certain settlers within what was formerly the Fort Dodge military reservation, in Ford County, Kans., and to confirm entries of public lands erroneously allowed thereon;

A bill (H. R. 2364) to provide for the disposal of Fort Hartsuff, Fort Sheridan, and Fort McPherson military reservations, in the State of Nebraska, to actual settlers under the provisions of the homestead laws;

A bill (H. R. 4341) to provide for the disposal of Fort Hartsuff, Fort Sheridan, and Fort McPherson military reservations, in the State of Nebraska, to actual settlers under the provisions of the homestead laws;

A bill (H. R. 3375) to open certain parts of the Fort Jupiter military reservation, in the State of Florida, to entry under the homestead laws: and

A bill (H. R. 2684) to restore the lands embraced in the Fort Lewis military reservation, in the State of Colorado, to the public domain.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. McRAE, also from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4667) to provide for the opening of certain abandoned military reservations, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

LAND ENTRIES, OKLAHOMA.

Mr. LATIMER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported as a substitute for House bill 284 a bill (H. R. 4859) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Iowa Reservation, Oklahoma; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The committee resumes consideration of the urgency deficiency bill.

When the committee rose on yesterday the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to offer an amendment to the pending bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] indicated his purpose of offering an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will withhold the amendment for the present, Mr. Chairman, and ask to introduce it as an amendment to the bill after this matter has been acted upon.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Let the pending section of the bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: For per diem, when absent from home and traveling on duty outside the District of Columbia, for special examiners or other persons employed in the Bureau of Pensions, detailed for the purpose of making special investigations pertaining to said Bureau, in lieu of expenses for subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance, $200,000.

Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment was read, as follows:

On page 4, after the word "dollars," in line 23, insert the following:

"Provided, however, That the clerks and other persons who shall be paid per diem and expenses under this appropriation shall be employed exclusively in the investigation of original pension claims and claims for increase of pension."

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all that part of the bill appropriating $200,000 for per diem and traveling expenses of special examiners and other persons, being all that part of the bill from line 15 down to and including line 23 on page 4, and insert:

"That in all cases where written charges or information have been, or may hereafter be, made by letter or otherwise tending to defeat the granting of a pension, or to the continuation of a pension already granted upon any grounds whatever which are deemed sufficient by the Pension Bureau to warrant an investigation, the Commissioner of Pensions shall in all such cases before the investigation is made of such charges or information furnish to the applicant or pensioner, as the case may be, a copy of such charges or information, together with the names of the person or persons making the same; and such applicant or pensioner shall be given an opportunity to be heard respecting such charges or information, and that no charges or information tending to defeat the granting of or the continuation of a pension already granted, whether made by an officer or employé of Government or private citizen, shall be considered, unless in writing and signed by the person or persons making the same."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make the point of order that this is new legislation and not germane to the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that this is a motion to strike out and insert, and can not be considered as an amendment until the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana has been disposed of.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make the point of order that it is not germane at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve the decision on that point until the amendment can be offered in the proper time.

Mr. WAUGH. Then I will move to amend the pending amendments by striking out the words "and other persons."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I make the same point against that amendment. It is not germane. It is not an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana, the Chair thinks, is clearly in order. The amendment is simply to strike out in line 18 the words "or other persons."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the question before the House is the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which is to strike out that paragraph of the bill and insert something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offered this as an amendment to the amendment, and the Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the committee will indulge me a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has just been read to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by inserting the words "special examiners," instead of persons. I find I have not used the exact language of the text. I suppose I have the right to make the modification.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be read by the Clerk as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, after the word "dollars," in line 23, insert:
"Provided, however, That the special examiners and other persons who shall be paid per diem and expenses, under this appropriation shall be employed exclusively in the investigation of original pension claims and claims for increase of pension."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] moves to strike out from this amendment the words "and other persons."

Mr. WAUGH. And on that, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I think this House does not understand the purpose and object of this legislation. The bill itself—with the report of the Commissioner of Pensions and the exhibit of the law clerk of that department which accompanies his report, and which he approves—informs us of the real object of this legislation. We are told in this discussion that the object of this measure is to assist the special examiners' department of the Bureau in aiding pensioners to discover evidence for the establishment of their claims. I desire to call attention to the language of the bill itself and the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, as a verification of the truth of the assertions that I am making:

For per diem, when absent from home and traveling on duty outside the District of Columbia, for special examiners—and other persons.

We have been told that this entire appropriation applies to the special examiners. But the bill says, for special examiners and

"or other persons" employed in the Bureau of Pensions, detailed for the purpose of making special investigations pertaining to said Bureau.

Now what does the Commissioner of Pensions tell us in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior? He tells us—

It would be well to have a force of secret agents selected from among the special examiners or—

"Elsewhere." This bill provides that special examiners "or other persons" may be detailed. Who compose the detail? Special examiners? No, sir; special examiners and "other persons."

The Commissioner further says in his report:

It would be well to select from among the special examiners and elsewhere persons whose duties it would be to investigate all pension cases involving crimes and offenses against the United States. These men should receive as liberal compensation as the secret agents of other departments, and the aid of Congress should be invoked for that purpose. When persons are steadily employed in a certain kind of work greater skill is developed. The creation of this force would be of great benefit to the Pension Office.

Mr. Chairman, the whole object and purpose of this legislation is patent—and I am surprised that any Republican can support it—is to pay the spies, the secret agents to be put upon the track of the old soldier, to shadow him in his outgoing and his incoming; and in case he should eat a hearty meal or draw a full breath, he does it under the penalty of suspension of his pension. Why, I was pleased the other day when the evidence of this House was taken on the proposition or assertion by the Executive that thousands of communities all over this country have their well-known pension frauds.

Why, sir, Mr. Chairman, when the 356 members of this House were put upon the stand, and the question was put to them by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to the truth of that proposition, we every one of us sat as dumb as a sheep before her shearers, and opened not our mouths, excepting the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]; and, Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the squad of soldiers that would be left after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] had gone through and separated all those that he considered to be frauds. There would not be a corporal's guard left, and they, under the estimation of the gentleman, would be under suspicion. I protest, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of every soldier in Indiana against this legislation as an outrage against common fairness and decency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] has misapprehended the effect of his motion. If I understand him correctly—in the confusion it is almost impossible to hear what my friend has said—if I understand him correctly, he proposes to strike out the words "or other persons" as contained in the amendment. I wish my friend to state whether that is correct or not.

Mr. WAUGH. My amendment is to strike out the words "or other persons."

Mr. HOLMAN. From the amendment?

Mr. WAUGH. No; from the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. From the original text. Oh, well, I see the case is somewhat different from what I thought. Of course it is clear that if those words "or other persons," are retained in the original text, they should be retained also in the proposed amendment. But my friend misapprehends this matter entirely.

Under existing law, 400 persons may be employed by the Commissioner of Pensions in the field, 150 special examiners, and details of clerks to the number of 250, making altogether 400; that is my recollection; so that my friend's amendment would leave out 250 persons who could receive this per diem and expenses in the field for the purposes of which he complains. My amendment confines the expenditure of this $200,000 to the investigation of original pension claims and claims for increase of pensions, instead of a general overhauling of the pension roll.

Mr. WAUGH. If my colleague from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will permit me, I will say that the object of the motion is to prevent the detailing of other persons. I understand the words "other persons" to mean detectives and spies.

Mr. HOLMAN. "Other persons," as used in the text of the bill, means clerks in the Pension Bureau who, under the law, may be detailed by the Pension Office to operate in the field.

Mr. WAUGH. Special examiners and "other persons."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If the gentleman will look at the text of the bill, it says:

For special examiners or other persons employed in the Bureau of Pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is using my time. My friend, Mr. WAUGH, does not understand, I presume, that these words "other persons" refer to persons who may be detailed under existing law from the Pension Office; and he certainly wants the same restrictions imposed upon them as are imposed upon special examiners, does he not?

Mr. WAUGH. I do not understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. You understand of course that under my amendment all the persons who are to be paid a per diem and expenses out of the $200,000 shall be employed only in the examination of pension claims now pending and claims for increase. You understand that?

Mr. WAUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right. It is "the other persons," the clerks who may be detailed from the Pension Office, as well as the special examiners, to whom my amendment applies. I wish all persons paid out of this $200,000 to be employed in the investigation of original pension claims or claims for increase, and not in a general raid on the pension roll.

Mr. WAUGH. I take it that this legislation is in keeping with the recommendation of the Pension Office, and the recommendation of the Pension Office is to have a lot of detectives.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman entirely misapprehends the effect of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment, and the Chair can not recognize any other gentleman.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to recognize any gentleman unless he wants to speak to this amendment or to offer a substantial amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I offer an amendment. I move to strike out the last word.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana on the right is a good one. I believe that this money ought to be expended only by officers of the Government—special examiners. And I desire for a moment to call the attention of the House, as it appears to my mind, to the insincerity of the men who are the enemies of pensions upon this floor, and who have made arguments in this debate. It is the province of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], and I have not a word of criticism if they desire to take that position. If it is their desire to antagonize the pensions of this country, it is their privilege, it is their right. But what I am opposed to is this: that under the guise and pretense of being in favor of pensions, of purging the pension roll of fraudulent pensions, they are seeking, and that is the very object, to bring the whole pension roll into disrepute. It is the whole roll that the gentleman from Georgia is seeking to attack.

Now, the gentleman from Georgia in the last Congress led that forlorn hope from the Committee on Appropriations in the five or six iniquitous amendments against the old soldiers that were offered to that bill; and he was so ignominiously defeated even by his own side, that he went back South singing dolefully "I am going back to Dixie." So he comes up again, and is persistent in the matter of again opposing pensions. The gentleman says himself in the Congressional Directory, and that is evidence that it must be true, because he says it, he "has been prominent in all political struggles in his State for many years." [Laughter.] You must accept that, because the gentleman himself says so. I invite him to add another sentence to his biography, and say "That he is also prominent in opposition to pensions for Union soldiers."

It is, however, evident that the gentleman was not half so vigorous, courageous, and energetic after the Yankee soldiers in 1861 to 1865 as he is now, otherwise he would have been a brigadier-general of the Confederacy in less than six months; but I find that for four years he was a private in the Confederate army. [Laughter.] I say if he had been half as vigorous, half as courageous and energetic after live Yankees in 1861 to 1865 he would have been a brigadier-general in less than six months. [Laughter.]

I want to say, further, to the gentleman, that neither epithets, braggadocio, words that are improper to be used on this floor, nor bullying, or anything in that line, will, in my opinion, deter the members upon this side of the House from standing by the Union soldier and by his just claims, and while I say that, I want to render praise to a good many gentlemen on that side of the House who are the true friends of the soldier. But the gentleman from Georgia is the enemy of the soldier and the soldier's pension; and not only of the dishonest, but he is the enemy of the whole roll of pensioners.

I understand there will be offered an amendment to this proposition to prevent pensions from being suspended without notice to the soldier. I heartily favor this proposition. I introduced in the extra session of this Congress a bill to that effect, the first bill, I believe, introduced to this effect in this House. There are a great many worthy pensioners whose claims have been suspended of late, and many without notice. I believe every soldier should be heard before his pension is suspended.

I send to the Clerk's desk, Mr. Speaker, a letter of an old soldier whose claim was lately suspended without notice, and as the writer of the letter supposed, the Pension Bureau made the order of suspension on the recommendation and representations of the local examiner; and there is no doubt in this and similar cases if the soldier had first had a hearing his pension would not have been suspended. The letter is as follows:

FAULKTON, S. DAK., November 15, 1893.

We arrived here this a. m. with Aaron Flyte, Company G, Sixty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. His pension certificate is No. 184167, and suspended July 12, 1893. On July 12, and now, was and is utterly helpless. Not able to dress himself for two years. Could not be moved in wagon of any sort. Carried him to train on a stretcher, and from train before examining board in this place. He can neither sit nor stand. Affidavits of leading Democrats and citizens were sent to Washington for appointment of special examiner to go to Gettysburg to examine him, as it was and is unsafe to move him, but still order was peremptory that he must go to Faulkton. Hence our post detailed four ex-soldiers to bring him here and take him back. Some in Gettysburg think suspension the result of spite work of one of our doctors, because Flyte employed another physician. Can you find out whether this is true?

S. M. HOWARD.

Hon. J. A. PICKLER, M. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. The Republican party made its reputation by hoisting the flag, and not by hauling it down and we stand there yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize gentlemen out of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ENLOE. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, the only reason I desire to say anything at the present time is to call attention to the character of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana as amended by his colleague [Mr. WAUGH]. This appropriation is for the purpose of supplying special examiners to perform the usual duties that have been heretofore performed by special examiners of the Pension Office. It does not propose to change the law in any particular, and it is a remarkable spectacle to see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who enjoys the soubriquet of the "watch-dog of the Treasury," offer an amendment on the floor of this House which proposes to prevent that force from investigating the frauds that are being perpetrated on the public Treasury.

It seems strange, too, Mr. Chairman, that another gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] should say that the Government shall not have the power to send out its agents to investigate frauds on the Government, even when information is furnished to the Commissioner that fraud is being perpetrated. I have seen demagogy rise to great heights in this House, but I have never seen it rise so high as it has risen in this debate, when gentlemen here, under the pretense of patriotism and love for the soldier, get up and defend fraud, and say that the Government shall not have agents to investigate charges of fraud.

Mr. WAUGH. The gentleman on the other side denies squarely that there is such fraud. He believes that there is only asserted fraud.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There was a conviction for perjury in the Federal court in my district about three weeks ago.

Mr. WAUGH. There was one Benedict Arnold.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman does not know anything of what he is talking if he asserts that there is no fraud, or else he does not care what he asserts; because the records of the courts of this country show that there have been 137 arrests, 241 indictments, and 105 convictions for pension frauds since this Administration came into power. It is the business of the Pension Bureau to bring these matters to the attention of the courts, and that is one of the functions of a special examiner or an officer detailed from the Bureau for such work. Mr. Chairman, I say that it ill becomes any man representing any constituency, I do not care where he resides or what kind of a constituency he represents, to rise on this floor and say that the Government shall be disarmed and shall not be authorized or enabled to investigate and prosecute notorious frauds.

Mr. PICKLER. So say we all.

Mr. ENLOE. Why do you fight it then?

Mr. PICKLER. We do not fight it.

Mr. ENLOE. That is exactly what you are doing. You are doing everything in your power to prevent the Government from exposing these fraudulent pensioners, who are no better than thieves; for I say that a man who gets upon the pension roll by perjury is no better than a thief.

Mr. PICKLER. We all say that.

Mr. ENLOE. Then why do you defend those men?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, you are attacking a man of straw. Nobody is defending fraud.

Mr. ENLOE. I refer to your own language. You advocate this amendment, which provides that these examiners shall not do anything but work upon original claims, and that means that a special examiner shall not investigate a case of fraud even in the neighborhood where he is working, though it may be brought to his attention. You also advocate the proposition that the other agents of the Bureau shall not have that power. What does that mean? It simply means that you are not willing to let this Government have the power to investigate these frauds.

I am just now in receipt of a telegram from the Commissioner of Pensions stating that the Federal grand jury at Dubuque, Iowa, has just returned thirty-one indictments against Van Leuven, a pension attorney, for pension frauds, and thirteen against Dr. Kessel and some others, which makes the total number of indictments to-day 241 since this Administration came into power. The adoption of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Indiana would absolutely destroy the power of the Bureau to hunt down and punish those who are defrauding the Government in pension cases.

Several MEMBERS addressed the Chair.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, there has been only one speech made on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I am in nowise advised as to the actual necessity for the appropriation as provided in the bill, and I think I can safely say that the tendency of the general discussion was not such as to throw any great light upon it, but that it was conducted rather from a political standpoint. The whole history of pension legislation and discussion in this country ever since the civil war has been in the same line, and no subject of legislation has ever been so much in the rut of political prostitution as this one, and no subject should in fact be as far removed from it. No party should be permitted to take money out of the public Treasury, and in the name of pensions and professed love for the soldier trade it for votes.

Now, all men agree, so far as the mere statement of principle goes, that fair, liberal pensions should be given to the soldiers of the country for actual injuries and complaints incident to actual service in the Army and Navy, and that all frauds upon the pension roll should be exposed and eliminated; but still our friends upon the other side as a whole, and a part upon this side, as a matter of fact and in the face of these protestations seek to make political capital out of any efforts in the direction of purifying the rolls and oppose any means proposed in this direction.

This leads me to the point I desire to make, and this is that we ought to have by law a complete, uniform, and just pension system, so guarded as to give full and ample pensions to deserving soldiers and sailors, and to give the fullest protection against fraud, so hedged about that no party can have even the temptation to make political capital out of it; and this can only be accomplished, in my judgment, by a constitutional provision. In the Fifty-second Congress I introduced a resolution for a constitutional amendment to this end, and reintroduced it in this Congress, House Resolution No. 17, and which is as follows:

No pension, nor any pay or emolument that does not cease with actual service, shall hereafter be granted, allowed, or paid to or on account of any soldier or sailor, except under the provisions of law existing at time of enlistment, nor unless claimed within two years from time right to the same accrues under the law.

The suggestions contained in this proposition are at most only tentative, but to my mind cover the troubles that have been met in making a fair, just, and liberal pension system. If we had now such a system, under the law we would be relieved at least from such acrimonious discussion and disgraceful vituperation as we have witnessed upon this discussion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto be ended in fifteen minutes. We have already discussed this section two days.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I will not object to the request of the gentleman if I can have an opportunity to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto shall be limited to fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that that be done. The committee has the power, under the new rules, to limit the debate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, if that motion is confined to amendments now pending there will be no objection to it.

A MEMBER. That is all that it covers.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It applies to all amendments that may be offered to this section, and I desire to offer one.

Mr. HICKS. So do I.

Mr. HUDSON. I want to offer an amendment. I have no objection to the limitation of the debate, if I can offer my amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Gentlemen should bear in mind that the House desires to adjourn for the holiday recess on Thursday or Friday next, and in the meantime this bill ought to be passed and sent to the Senate. This is the third day we have discussed this question, and I think I have shown a disposition to be extremely liberal as to debate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I shall occupy only a few moments with my amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. That is all right.

Mr. HUDSON. I will make no objection, provided I can be allowed afterwards to submit my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to gentlemen that there will be no limit to the offering of amendments. The committee can limit debate, but it can not limit the right to offer amendments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (to Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky). Make it five minutes instead of ten.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr WAUGH] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

In line 2 of the amendment strike out the words "and claims for increase of pension."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WAUGH to the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, it was rejected, there being—ayes 49, noes 68.

Mr. WAUGH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I presume that in Committee of the Whole we are not entitled to the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. The yeas and nays can not be called in the Committee of the Whole. The question is now on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, further, That the special examiners and other persons who shall be paid a per diem and expenses under this appropriation shall be employed exclusively in the investigation of original claims and claims for increase of pension.

The question being put,

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 75.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this question the ayes are 60, the noes 75. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted; and I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late. The Chair had announced the result and had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. HOLMAN. I misunderstood the announcement of the Chair. I was on my feet to call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the statement of the gentleman his point of "no quorum" will be entertained.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 86.

Mr. HOLMAN. To avoid consumption of time, I simply give notice that I will not insist now on a quorum, but at the proper time I will move to recommit this bill for the purpose of making this amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Of course the gentleman will have the right to do that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I simply give this notice so that there may be a full expression of the sentiment of the House on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 78, the noes 86. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 23, on page 4, insert the following:
"Provided, That no pension shall be suspended or stopped except after full hearing, of which the pensioner shall have previous reasonable notice, with opportunity to submit testimony in support of his or her pension and in reply to that affecting his or her right to receive a pension."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I raise a point of order on this amendment. It is not germane to this section of the bill; and it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] on his point of order, if he desires to submit any argument or precedent in support of it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I submit the point to the Chair without discussion. I presume the Chair appreciates the purport of the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that gentlemen on the other side of the House can hardly afford to vote down this amendment. In the first place it is fair and right. If there is any one thing about which complaint has been made throughout the country it is that the soldiers who have been drawing pensions have not had an opportunity to be heard in these investigations.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. With pleasure.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Suppose such a case as that which I put yesterday to the gentleman from South Dakota. Or suppose that within a week or so before the time for the quarterly payment of pensions it is discovered that a man who has been drawing pension on the ground of ninety days' service has, in fact, served only thirty days; or suppose that he has been placed on the roll by forgery or by perjury, as in the case of the Virginia frauds or the New Mexico frauds. Does the gentleman believe that in such a case the quarterly pension ought to be paid to the pensioner and then an examination be had; or does he believe that the best way to do is simply to suspend payment and give the pensioner a chance to be heard. That is the whole contention between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I undertake to say that after a pension has once been adjudicated it is a vested right——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And no government, no officer of the government has any more right to strike that pension down without a full hearing of the case and an opportunity on the part of the pensioner to be heard in his own behalf than it would have to open a judgment without notice to the party concerned. These cases having been adjudicated by lawful authority are in the nature of judgments; they are vested rights on the part of the pensioners. If any case has been wrongfully adjudicated let it be regularly reopened, and after due hearing let the pension be stopped; but for God's sake give the soldier an opportunity to have his day in court—to be heard in his own defense.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Undoubtedly; but what is his "day in court?"

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Notice of the complaint or allegation, and knowledge of the testimony supposed to affect his rights.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And an opportunity to answer it if he can.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Undoubtedly; we agree on that. Now, the only point, and I submit it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a lawyer and a man of candor, is, pending that, a day of payment comes, and the Government has discovered that the individual has either by fraud or perjury obtained his standing on the roll and has given him notice of that fact——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. On ex parte testimony.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky (continuing). And the case has not yet been adjudicated. Now should the payment about to become due be made to the man under such circumstances, or should it be withheld until this question has been determined? That is the whole of it and I submit it to the gentleman for his consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky says the Government "has discovered." How can it be fairly said to have discovered a fraud until it hears the pensioner and what he has to say in his defense? It may be that there is no foundation for the allegation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And on the other hand it may be a matter of record of the highest kind.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, but that is not a judicial discovery. It is not a discovery in the legal sense until the pensioner has been heard in response to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania my time. But before that, in response to his question, I put the case to him that I suggested on yesterday, or the two cases in the remarks I had the honor to submit to the committee, where the records of the Department in one case showed that the pensioner had been dishonorably discharged, and in the other case that the pensioner had not served for thirty years. These are sample cases. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to mean that he thinks the payment of the pension ought to be made to these soldiers pending an investigation? That is the sample case that I commend to the gentleman's consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In the first place there are not, and can hardly be, any such sample cases as that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. There they are. The gentleman can examine them himself.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Unless, I was going on to say, they are exceedingly limited in number. There must be, in the nature of things, very few such cases. And then it will be still a question of construction. But even as you put it, it would be a question whether the soldier has not certain rights which have been conferred upon him by the granting of his pension.

Now, we are to presume that the Commissioner of Pensions and the officials who examined the case and granted the pension had authority to do it on competent testimony. We are to presume that that testimony was examined and the question adjudicated upon the testimony. We are not to presume that this is a fraud, without a hearing. Why not let this class of cases take the same course with all others? If a judgment has been rendered, I do not care if it had been an interlocutory judgment, no court would open it up until the defendant had had his day in court.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The ordinary practice where I reside is that the court will grant an interlocutory or temporary injunction to prevent the collection of the execution until the plaintiff can come in. The way you begin is to stop payment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That, of course, is in questions of great or unprecedented emergency. But there is no such tendency here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no one thing that will put this pension question at rest so much as the adoption of this provision. You must give the soldiers an opportunity to be heard in defense of their pensions before being suspended. And perhaps if there had not been so many suspended cases the community would not be in the condition we find it that all over the country an impression has gone up that this Administration is disposed to strike pensions down, regardless of the rights of the soldier and without giving him an opportunity to be heard. I want to correct that impression and you want to correct it.

Let the soldier be in the same category as any other man who prosecutes successfully a claim against the Government. Treat his case as an adjudicated question, and allow his claim to be recognized as valid until there shall be evidence forthcoming to the contrary. Let him have an opportunity to be heard before the case is suspended. Certainly you can afford to do that much for the soldier. All these cases suspended summarily have been practically reinstated. It only turns on a handful of cases. You can afford to at least put this in your bill, and when it is done you have taken a step to restore confidence in the Administration further than any other you can possibly take in this regard, and I appeal to you therefore to let this come in and be a part of the bill.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to obtain some time in which to engage in the general discussion of this bill, and especially that part of it now being considered; but owing to the limited time allowed for general debate, I was unable to do so, and therefore embrace this opportunity, under the five-minute rule to say a few words in regard to the suspension of pensions and the proposition to make this appropriation, hoping to be able later in the session to obtain time to express more fully my views on this subject.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I intend to vote for the appropriation, believing as I do that it is in the interest of the speedy adjustment of the 18,000 claims of old soldiers now pending under the old law; but, sir, I do not want that vote to be construed into an indorsement of the indiscriminate suspension of pensions indulged in by the Pension Bureau. That action is not now, never was, and never will be approved by me, by the people whom I have the honor to represent, or by the people of my State. The election in Ohio in November last demonstrated fully that the people of that State do not approve of that action.

And let me say to gentlemen on this floor that the action of the Pension Bureau in the matter of the suspension of the pensions of Union soldiers had more to do with giving to Governor McKinley his majority of 80,000 than anything else and all else combined; and, Mr. Chairman, without any intention or desire to reflect upon anyone, I want to say that no party need hope to reduce that majority in Ohio by unjustly interfering with that sacred roll containing the names of the men and those dependent upon them whose blood cemented the union of these States. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no pension allowed shall be revoked or suspended, excepting those obtained by fraud or perjury.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided always, That before any of the aforesaid $200,000 shall be drawn upon by the Bureau of Pensions all pensions heretofore suspended on the charge of fraud in procuring said pensions without due notice and a full and fair hearing shall be restored to the pension rolls and paid to the pensioners until after due notice and a full and fair hearing and determination such pensions are found to be fraudulent; and

Provided further, That in all cases where fraud is charged against pensioners in the procuring of pensions such pensioner shall be furnished a copy of all such charges by the Pension Bureau, including the names of the parties making such charges, and shall be furnished a copy of all evidence in support of such charges free of cost to such pensioner.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKS] who offered the amendment to the amendment. He is first entitled to the floor. The substitute of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON] can not be presented to the House until after the amendment to the amendment is voted upon.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to place myself upon record against this part of the bill now pending, unless the amendment of my friend and colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] prevails. The amendment, with the addition suggested by myself, is eminently fair, and will place beyond question the right of the soldier to enjoy his pension unless it is stopped in a legal and proper way.

The time was, Mr. Chairman, when the men who enjoyed the honor of being examiners of the Pension Department assisted these old veterans and their widows and orphans in preparing and presenting their claims to this Government, but I take it, from the methods that have prevailed under the present Administration, that instead of their being special examiners for the Pension Department, that is a misnomer, and they should be called special detectives; for instead of carrying out the wishes of the people of this great Government, to help these old men and their widows and orphans, these special examiners are spies upon their track, and instead of maintaining the pension roll as one of honor these examiners, so called, are attempting to make it one of dishonor, and are endeavoring to create the impression that the entire pension list is honeycombed with fraud.

Where is the evidence of fraud and the foundation for this hue and cry raised against the veterans of the country by the Pension Department and the enemies of the men who wore the blue? With this great army of detectives in the field, with the enemies of the veteran in command of the situation, with the public mind prepared by unfriendly newspapers and poisoned against the honest pensioners of the country, the Secretary of the Interior directed to be taken from the files of the Department of Pensions by one stroke of his pen several thousand adjudicated and legally granted pensions, and sent to as many homes in this country the fact that the Government that had promised to protect and defend the old soldier in his declining years, instead of being his friend as heretofore, was now his enemy; and in addition to the personal knowledge of this fact being brought home to the pensioner and his family of the suspicion and unfriendliness of his Government, he was further humiliated by being held up before his community and neighbors as a man who had committed a fraud upon his country and had been receiving a pension to which he was not entitled, thus securing for the man who had heretofore been looked upon in his neighborhood as a patriot and lover of his country, a character for fraud, and as one who obtained from the Government he had helped to save and upbuild unjust and dishonest money.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that out of the many thousand men thus branded and held up to the public as dishonest men over three-fourths of them have already been reinstated, thus proving that even the unfriendly Department was mistaken in their charge of wholesale fraud against the men who wore the blue. Even the President himself, who has never been accused of an overflowing love for the Union veteran, joins in this unjust hue and cry, and in his annual message to this body he uses this unjustifiable language:

"The discovery having been made that many names had been put upon the pension roll by means of wholesale and gigantic frauds, the Commissioner suspended payment upon a number of pensions which seemed to be fraudulent."

Why, Mr. Chairman, did they seem fraudulent? Where are the facts authorizing the President to make this sweeping statement? Where is the evidence on which the President based his communication to Congress and the country? He owes it, sir, to this House, to the country, and above all does he owe it to the gallant men who stood between this country and its everlasting destruction in the days of its greatest trial, the evidence on which this wholesale charge of fraud is based. In this same message, Mr. Chairman, I read this language:

Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments by the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds.

Where is the evidence of these thousands of neighborhoods that have their fraudulent pensioners and of these appalling conspiracies? Why has not the Commissioner or the learned and distinguished Secretary of the Interior given this House and the country the facts that permit the President of this great country to utter in his annual message the language above quoted that is read by all the English-speaking world and is quoted to the great discredit of my gallant comrades of the Army? On the part of these gallant veterans, both dead and living, I deny these statements and demand the proof of these unjust charges, and until the proof is furnished I appeal to the loyalty and fairness of the good people of this land to suspend judgment on these gallant men whom the President so severely condemns. Until the proof is adduced and furnished, thank God it is the unwritten law of this country, that every man is innocent until he is proven guilty, and this unwritten law has its place in the hearts of the great American people, and notwithstanding the charges made by the President against these old veterans of the war, the people have responded in answer to that charge the verdict of not guilty.

I was very much interested in the defense made upon the floor of this House yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN] of the present Commissioner of Pensions. The record of Judge Lochren as a soldier can not be assailed, but his record as the Commissioner of Pensions is one that does him great injury, and one that reflects very seriously upon his gallant bearing during the days when this country had to struggle for its existence. I regret, sir, that circumstances are such that Judge Lochren has to be apologized for upon the floor of this House, and that his action should need such an apology. I rejoice in the fact that up to this time there has never before been a Commissioner of Pensions whose actions needed apology upon the floor of this House.

Mr. HAYES. How about Raum?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They had to investigate him.

Mr. HICKS. Yes; and that committee failed to besmirch him. He stands preëminent as a man who was fair and just in his treatment of Union soldiers, and in his treatment of their claims. We had no right to expect that Secretary Smith would do differently than he has done, but we had a right to expect that Judge Lochren, one with whom we had touched elbows, would at least grant to the old soldier the right to a hearing before he would undertake to cut off from him the small pittance allowed to him by the Government which he helped to save.

The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], and further amended by myself, will place the pensions of these gallant men beyond the reach of an unfriendly hand, or at least will place them in such a position that their pensions can not be stopped until they have the right that is granted to every other citizen of the Republic—to have a hearing before a sentence of condemnation is passed upon them.

Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe the time will soon come again, in the history of this country, when the friend and not the enemy of the Union veteran will occupy the high places within the gift of this great and generous people, and if this measure passes, as reported in the bill under consideration, without amendment, it is adding additional humiliation to the men who wore the blue, and unless so amended I shall feel constrained to vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish, for the information of gentlemen, to have read at the Clerk's desk Order No. 240, which is now enforced in the Pension Office, from which it will appear that no pensioner is being suspended without notice.

Mr. HICKS. Not now. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. No, not now, since the present Commissioner has reorganized that Bureau. I ask to have this read, and ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat to give it his attention and "Mark now how plain a tale shall put you down."

Mr. HICKS. They were first suspended, and the order referred to by the gentleman was issued after the mischief and injustice had been done.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, August 26, 1893.

[Order No. 240.]

In the reëxamination of all cases allowed under section 2 of the act of June 27, 1890, the practice of the Bureau is hereby changed and modified as follows:

First. Where it appears, prima facie on the face of the papers, that the pensioner was not entitled to any rating, the payment of the pension shall be at once suspended, and the pensioner notified that he will be dropped from the rolls after sixty days from such notice, unless he shall in the mean time file competent evidence showing his right to pension.

Second. Where, on the face of the papers, it appears that the pensioner is entitled to a less rate than he is now receiving, he shall be notified that his pension will be reduced to such less rate, unless within sixty days from such notice he shall file competent evidence of his right to a higher rating.

Third. Where it appears on the face of the papers that the pensioner had been allowed a pension under a prior law, and that he is not entitled under the act of June 27, 1890, to any higher rate of pension than was so allowed under such prior law, he shall be notified that his pension under the act of June 27, 1890, will be dropped and his pension under such prior law restored, unless within sixty days from such notice he shall file competent evidence that he is entitled to a higher rate than was granted by his pension under such prior law.

Fourth. Every notice shall inform the pensioner that upon his application to the Commissioner he will be immediately ordered for examination by a local medical board, to enable him to obtain the necessary evidence to show his right to pension.

Fifth. When any pensioner shall have complied with the requirement of such notice, and furnished evidence tending to support his claim to be continued on the rolls, the case shall at once be a "special case," and be promptly adjudicated. (There will be no preliminary suspension in any case hereafter, except as provided in the first subdivision of this order.)

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Approved.
HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the date of that?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. August 26, 1893.

Objection is made that prior to that time suspensions were made without notice. I wish to state that it has been the uniform practice since the organization of the Pension Office. That is, suspensions were made during all the Administrations without notice, and it is the excellent Commissioner of Pensions now in the office who for the first time deviated from the time-honored practice, if it can be an honored practice to suspend pensions without notice. I have no objection to putting into law what the Commissioner of Pensions has put into practice; but I do not like to see him misrepresented. He was himself a brave soldier, and is very much more in sympathy with his comrades than those who seem determined to misrepresent and malign him. I am for the amendment, but I only wished to show that the Commissioner has inaugurated this practice, and that he is in no wise justly amenable to such criticism as we have just heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to a suggestion of several gentlemen upon the floor, and will ask to have read one of the rules of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any other person smoke upon the floor of the House at any time; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Chair admonishes the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeeper of this House that this rule must be observed. The Chair will look to the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeeper to strictly enforce the rules. [Applause.]

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I rise for the purpose of limiting debate. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendments thereto shall be closed at half past 2, which is ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] had asked the Chair to recognize him next to the gentleman from Kansas, and also the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN], and the Chair has stated that he would do so.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Then I will increase the time to fifteen minutes, so as to include the gentleman from Kansas, the gentleman from New Hampshire, and the gentleman from Indiana. That will give ten minutes to gentlemen on the other side and five minutes to a gentleman on this side.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who yielded the floor to his colleague.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I simply want to protest against this, for the reason that I desire to have some more time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. WELLS. I object.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas for five minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I am not moved by any disposition to make capital out of the present unfortunate situation. I am honestly impressed with the idea that the Secretary of the Interior has made a serious mistake in authorizing the suspension of pensions on a secret charge of fraud, without notice to the pensioner and a fair and honest hearing. It is admitted by all parties upon this floor that the pension roll is one of honor and in no sense a charity, that all pensions that have been granted have been so allowed in strict accordance with the laws governing the Pension Bureau, and consequently on their face all pensions are legal and valid, and the pensioner has a vested right in his pension, which can only be set aside on charges of fraud or mistake, and of such charges he is entitled to notice and a full, fair, and open hearing. He is entitled to know who the witnesses are who are called against him, and entitled to a fair opportunity to controvert such charges before judgment is rendered against him. He certainly is entitled to as much consideration at the hands of this Government as the criminal who has been guilty of a vicious crime.

I deny the power of the Secretary of the Interior or of the President of the United States or any man or set of men to take away from the soldier his pension at his or their own will, and I charge such acts as grossly arbitrary and in violation of every rule or principle of law known to civilized jurisprudence. I think it the duty of Congress in voting this allowance for investigation to at the same time say to the Department you must not in the slightest degree do an old pensioner an injustice. This Government is too great to do an un air act, and great as it is it can not afford to trample upon the rights of one of the humblest defenders of its flag.

I know that it will be claimed that the Department ought not to be required to give the pensioner the names of those who have furnished evidence against him or them, but here again I must beg leave to differ from such a position. The pensioner must go into the open sunlight of public gaze to get his testimony. The burden is upon him to furnish all the testimony to show his right to such pension, and I repudiate with scorn the proposition that this Government, in order to place itself upon a level with the pensioner, must indulge in secret and underhand methods. As I have already said, the Secretary of the Interior has made a mistake in this matter, and he and his friends ought to admit it. I do not agree with honorable gentlemen upon this floor who are trying to make political capital out of this mistake and stir up strife and bitterness throughout the country. Such action is unworthy of the honorable gentlemen engaged in it, if such is their intention. To err is human; not to err is a divine attribute.

No Administration has been wholly free from errors, and it will probably be several generations before we have one that will be free from mistakes. The suspending of pensions during the hearing of charges of fraud made against the pensioner will bring distress to a great many humble but honest homes throughout the land, and I submit to this House that on the near approach of the Christmas holidays it is not only proper, but important that every old soldier throughout the land and his family should be made to feel that their country has not forgotten and appreciates their loyal and patriotic devotion to her cause. It is better that ninety and nine fraudulent pensions should be paid than that one honest pensioner should be deprived of the bounty that is so justly due him. If this or some similar amendment is not allowed, I feel it my duty to vote against this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the subject presented by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] is one which is covered by a bill introduced by myself, which has been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and which is now being considered by that committee, with, I hope, a fair prospect of a favorable report in the near future. Since, however, this matter is brought before this committee by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I feel entirely absolved on the ground of courtesy to the committee of which I am chairman, and I desire at the proper moment to offer an amendment as a substitute, being section 1 of the bill to which I referred on yesterday and which appears in to-day's RECORD.

Now, I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, upon this subject that since 1803 a practice has prevailed in the Pension Office of suspending pensions without notice, pending investigation. This practice is one that was indulged in by the present administration, and I understand by every administration of the Pension Office since 1803, not only without law, but in the face of express existing statutes. I desire to say now to the members of this committee that, without making an attack upon any officer and making no attack upon any Administration, there is no law to-day existing upon the statute books of the United States that authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions, nor has there ever been any such in the last ninety years, to make suspension of a pension without giving notice to the pensioner.

I desire now to express my concurrence in what my colleague from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] has said here to-day, that the order made by the present Commissioner of Pensions in last August was a modification of the custom or practice which has long existed in that Bureau, and this modification is a step in the direction of recognizing the just claims of the soldier. Mr. Chairman, the square question is simply this, does any man, does any member of this House, desire to disturb an existing right without giving due notice?

Mr. DINGLEY. Due notice and hearing.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Due notice in the first place, and in the next place due hearing. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appeal to you, is it not right, is it not the whole trend of the laws of this country, of the laws of every State in the Union, that before you lay your hand upon an existing right you must give notice to the parties interested?

I will offer my amendment at the proper time, and hope it will pass.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, I wish first to say a word in regard to the charge that the pension roll is a roll of dishonor. Thank God, it comes from very few persons, but they make a great deal of noise. It comes from the few unreconstructed rebels from the South and the surviving copperheads of the North, the two classes but for whom there would have been no pension roll at all. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Of the former I have yet great hope. For those of our countrymen generally who were engaged in the rebellion I have the highest respect, because they are patriots to-day; but for the surviving copperhead there is no hope. He is too much like the original creature for whom he was so appropriately named. [Laughter.]

The pension roll a roll of dishonor! Every year the scrutiny of the rolls of the churches of this country develop more of shame and of dishonor than you have ever developed or that you ever can develop in the pension roll of the United States. [Applause.] Even in the olden time among the Disciples there was one reprobate, there was one copperhead. [Laughter.] God grant that in our time it may not prove to be true that the man who held the bag then is the man who holds the bag to-day. [Laughter.] No, Mr. Chairman, the pension roll is a roll of honor, and it is in the keeping of men of honor from the North and I believe from the South also. You may purge that roll with your utmost endeavors and you will find that there never has been a list of men who have stood so high and so deservedly high in the estimation of their countrymen as do the Union pensioners of this land. The pension roll is but a proper continuation of the Revolutionary roll of honor, and as such it will stand, an honor to this country for all time.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose mainly to appeal for a generous administration of the existing pension laws of the country. This law of June 27, 1890, is one in which I have a right to feel an interest, for I was identified with its origin fully ten years ago, and I know that that bill was brought forward in the interests of economy—of economy as well as justice, gentlemen. There was a very strong feeling that there ought to be a service pension given to those who had survived the war of the rebellion. Our friends on the other side were pressing for a service pension for those who had been engaged in the Mexican war, a very large proportion of whom had been later identified, as is generally known, with the military service of the rebellion.

A strong effort was made to prevent the passage of that bill, and an intense opposition was developed to it unless the soldiers who had fought to preserve the Union could be provided for by an amendment to the same bill. I tried to have both classes provided for, upon the principle of need, so that any man who had fought for the country even in the Mexican war, though he might have been in the rebellion afterwards, should be provided for as well as the Union soldier, so far as his necessity was concerned. Finally we gave way, and the Mexican service-pension bill was passed, applying to all who had been engaged in the Mexican war.

The other bill under various forms was pressed in successive Congresses, and at last it passed in the form in which it stands on the statute book to-day, and it was passed to avoid the tremendous drain upon the Treasury that would be entailed by a general service law. Now, I think the present Administration has developed a disposition to administer this particular law in such a way as practically to nullify it, and I trust that will not be done, for I assure you, gentlemen, that there is a rising feeling at the North which will remedy that by demanding the enactment of a general service law if there is no other way of providing for the veterans of the Union. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I represent a Bourbon Democratic constituency. In my Congressional district there is perhaps not a single Federal pensioner, except a few negro teamsters and cooks. But I also represent a constituency which has a great love of justice in the abstract, and, representing that sort of a constituency, I stand here to-day in favor of two things, which it would appear from the present debate are irreconcilable, but which in my mind are very reconcilable. The one is the purging the pension roll, making of it a roll of honor, and the other is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Representing a Bourbon Democratic constitutency with no Federal pensioners, I am yet in favor of both these propositions. We take some pride down our way in the pension roll, not because any of us are on it, but because our people did something to make it. [Laughter.] Taking that sort of pride in the pension roll, it occurs to me that as a matter of justice—and I believe in doing justice though the heavens fall—the fact that a man is on the pension roll is a prima facie something in his favor. He stands in a position where evidence ought to be offered to change the status which he occupies. I think that being on the pension roll is a prima facie reason, though not a conclusive one, for supposing that the man deserves a pension. [Applause.]

I do not believe, therefore, that it would be good policy on the part of the Democratic party (because nothing is good policy which is unjust) to defeat a proposition which simply asks that notice and an opportunity to be heard shall be given before a man's name is taken off that pension roll after it has once been put upon it.

Now, my friends, as a Democrat, as a Southern man, interested in purging the pension roll, I say that the thing of all things which we must not do is to excite sympathy with fraud. I believe that the pension roll is "honeycombed with fraud;" and above all things in the world, I do not want to excite sympathy with that fraud. I do not want to put our enemies in a position where they can go to the country upon a false issue, an issue which is not the true and the right issue, but unreal, and demanding a sort of maudlin sympathy.

I believe that we should purge the pension roll, and that there is but one way to do it thoroughly and successfully—to get the common sense and the common conscience of the American people behind the frauds that are on the pension roll. And in order to obtain that we have to be very careful to excite no sympathy with fraud itself, permitting it to commingle and mix itself with patriotism and other things which in themselves are praiseworthy. I think it is of the utmost importance that in attaining a right end we antgonize no right feeling; and I think that we would antagonize a right feeling if we should announce generally that a man who has been placed upon the pension roll can be taken from it without at least having notice given him and an opportunity to be heard.

I simply wanted to say this much in justice to the young Democracy and the Southern Democracy, in reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]: for I come just about as near being what he calls an "unreconstructed rebel" as any man on this floor, who was not old enough to have fought in either army during the "late unpleasantness."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order made by the committee, all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is now closed.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have only five minutes to present some views on this question. Yesterday I spoke to the Chairman, and he assured me I should have the opportunity to offer an amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman, but he yielded his time to another gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to speak for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I desire to offer reads as follows:

On page 4, after line 23, add the following:

"And in furtherance of the policy expressed in resolutions passed by Congress March 3, 1865, those charged with the duty of appointing or detailing men to perform the services and receive the money above mentioned shall give preference to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States who are capable of performing such duty."

Mr. Chairman, I have desired to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I was assured by the Chairman that I would have an opportunity to do so. But the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky limiting the time deprives me of the opportunity.

I now ask the unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole House to allow this amendment to be offered. The amendment is not offered in factious opposition to the bill, but with a sincere desire to secure fair treatment of those whose claims for pensions are incomplete. My amendment reads as follows:

At the end of line 23, page 4, add:

"And in furtherence of the policy expressed in resolutions of Congress passed March 3, 1865, those who are charged with the duty of appointing and detailing men to perform the services and receive the money above mentioned shall give preference to those honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the United States who are capable of performing such duties."

I believe that there is a prevalent opinion throughout the entire country that the present Administration, from the President down to the Commissioner of Pensions, is hostile to the pension system of former Administrations. This opinion may not be well founded, but I believe that if this amendment is put into the bill it will tend to create greater confidence in the sincerity of the Commissioner of Pensions when he states that these special examinations are made in the interest of those whose claims require additional evidence to complete them.

The old veterans are inclined to believe that the purpose is to antagonize their claims rather than to aid and support them, and that there is an effort being made to deprive them of their just rights. If this is not so, there is no better way to disprove it than by placing the matter in the hands of their friends. There is no doubt in my mind that if this course should be pursued it would tend to dispel the shadow of distrust now hovering over the Pension Bureau. It would facilitate the settlement of all just claims.

It may be said that the old comrades would be partial toward each other. I think not to the extent of favoring dishonest claims. There is no class of men in this country who can be depended upon to resist fraudulent pensions more than the old soldiers themselves. They do not ask favors, but they demand fairness. They do not want a lot of young men, many of whom were born since the war and some of whom are unfriendly to the pension system, going about the country consulting with those who are unfriendly to pensioners, or who have some petty malice against some particular pension claimant.

I believe it would be both wise and just to send out men to investigate pension claims in a spirit of friendliness, rather than in search of some shadowy statements of persons who have not the manliness to face an open investigation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this amendment should be offered; and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky, who has charge of the bill, will allow me to offer it notwithstanding the limitation of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the order adopted by the Committee of the Whole does not preclude any gentleman from the privilege of offering amendments. It simply limits the debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio at the proper time to offer his amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Then I will not trespass further upon the time of the committee just now, but at a later stage will embrace the opportunity to submit this amendment, which I trust will receive the favorable action of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKS] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

The amendment of Mr. HICKS was read, as follows:

Provided further, That no pension allowed shall be revoked or suspended excepting those obtained by fraud or perjury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there not a substitute pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a substitute pending, offered by the gentleman from Kansas; but that can not be voted on until these amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would like to amend the amendment last read by adding the words "or mistake," so as to read, "excepting those obtained by fraud, perjury, or mistake." I suppose that if any person has been placed on the pension roll by clear mistake, no gentleman would desire that such pension should be continued.

Mr. HICKS. I accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment as modified was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on this amendment as modified.

Mr. HICKS. I will withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I offer the amendment that I send to the desk to the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the work "Provided," in the pending amendment, and insert:

"That any pension heretofore or that may hereafter be granted to any applicant therefor under any law of the United States authorizing the granting and payment of pensions, on application made and adjudicated upon, shall be deemed and held by all officers of the United States to be a vested right in the grantee to that extent that payment thereof shall not be withheld or suspended until, after due notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days, the Commissioner of Pensions, after hearing all the evidence, shall decide to annul, vacate, modify, or set aside the decision upon which such pension was granted. Such notice to grantee must contain a full and true statement of any charges or allegations upon which such decision granting such pension shall be sought to be in any manner disturbed or modified."

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he will not be willing to accept this as an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think not. I am afraid if I do, the amendment may not be adopted. I believe mine will go through on that side of the House.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MARTIN of Indiana, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 101, noes 45.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs now on the amendment as amended.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask if this amendment was not offered as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The amendment just adopted struck out the preceding amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], and the question now is on the adoption of that amendment as amended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Let the amendment now before the House be reported.

The amendment of Mr. MARTIN of Indiana was again read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have just come into the Hall from the committee room, and do not understand the parliamentary situation. I wish to know if the proposition is in such shape that we may get a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment just adopted strikes out the larger part of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and inserts something else, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky) there were—ayes 123, noes 46.

So the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I desire to give notice that I will move in the House for a yea-and-nay vote on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON], which the Clerk will read.

The amendment of Mr. HUDSON was again reported.

Mr. HUDSON. I desire to say that as I understand it the amendment, or Mr. MARTIN'S substitute, is in accord with the one offered by myself, and with the consent of the committee, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to do it.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

On page 4, after line 28, add:

"And in furtherance of the policy expressed in resolutions passed by Congress March 3, 1865, those charged with the duty of appointing or detailing men to perform the services and receive the money above mentioned preference shall be given to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, who are capable of performing such duties."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make the point of order on that amendment. It changes the law or is in accordance with existing law. In either case we have no right to legislate on the deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken unless the gentleman from Ohio is prepared to show to the contrary.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If it reaffirms the existing law it is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. The amendment simply provides how the money appropriated shall be expended, and I think is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. But the point of order is made that this is legislation upon an appropriation bill, by providing how the officers appointed under this law shall be paid, or how they shall be selected. There is no such restriction in the existing law.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. On the question of order I desire to be heard briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think it would expedite matters to state that under the present rules the officers of the Pension Department are selected under the civil service examination. It is a change in that respect.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; these special examiners are not appointed under civil service rules.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky and Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it is under some special examination of the office. It is not by an examination of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. All of the details are.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; but not the special examiners.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But this amendment applies to all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILSON] briefly on the point of order. The gentleman wishes to read the existing law.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the following is the joint resolution which is referred to in the amendment:

Resolved, etc., That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty should be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they shall be found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office.—Revised Statutes, section 1754.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not make it obligatory upon the officer appointing, and especially it can not be effective where those officers are appointed under the civil service law by examination. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For the following expenses of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, namely: For compensation of crier from May 25, 1893, to June 30, 1894, inclusive, $1,383.33; for messenger from May 1, 1893, to June 30, 1894, $340; for clerical assistance and necessary expenditures in the conduct of the clerk's office, $1,000; in all, $3,223.33, one-half of which sum shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I offer an amendment to correct the text of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, in lines 7 and 8, strike out "$83.33," and insert "$20.58;" and in lines 12 and 13 strike out "$223.33," and insert "$162.58."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay all session employés of the House of Representatives authorized by the act making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1893, to the end of the present session of Congress, $13,278.68.

Mr. HAYES. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, after line 14, insert:

"For mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $130,000, for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress.

"For mileage of Senators for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, $65,000.

"For stationery for Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories for the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, $45,000.

"For stationery for Senators for the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, $7,000."

Mr. WELLS. I rise to a point of order. That is adding to the appropriation, and it is not in order to do so.

Mr. HAYES. That is not a good point of order.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LYNCH. It is, that this is new legislation, not authorized by existing law, that it is not in furtherance of any existing statute, and that it increases the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] on his point of order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him with an amendment to the point of order? I make the point of order against the last two clauses, providing for stationery for members and so forth.

Mr. HOLMAN. One point of order will cover the whole, anyway.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think the point of order as to the first two items is not well taken, and I do not want to lose the point of order as to the items for stationery.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] on his point of order. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will maintain order, so that what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] has to say can be heard.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, the rule under which I make this point of order is familiar to all the old members of the House at least, but for the benefit of those who have paid no attention to it I will read so much of it as applies to the point of order I have made. The rule is:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, when this Congress came into office on the 4th of last March the law allowed 20 cents a mile for travel, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled going to and returning from each regular session of Congress, and the word "regular" is found in that act of 1866 for the first time. Prior to that the law read that each Delegate and Member shall receive his mileage on the first day of each session, and the first day of each subsequent session; which shows very clearly that when the act of 1866 was passed it was intended to limit the mileage to one regular session, and no more. That law has been construed by both Houses of Congress since its enactment in 1866, as I will show.

The Forty-fifth Congress met in extra session in 1877, in October of that year, and Mr. Ellsworth, a gentleman from Michigan, in the House introduced a bill allowing mileage for the extra session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman this question? Is not this the "regular session?"

Mr. LYNCH. I will come to that. We all know it is, and that we received our mileage for this session in August.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you not know that we have the Attorney-General's opinion that we are entitled to mileage for this session under the existing law?

Mr. LYNCH. I do not, but do not care if you have.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Mileage, and by that committee was reported back on the 15th day of November, 1877, with a report as follows:

The Committee on Mileage, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 650) providing for the payment of mileage to members of Congress for attendance upon the extra or called session, has had the same under consideration, and directed me to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass. And the committee has further directed me to report to the House that in the opinion of the committee there is no law in force giving members of Congress mileage for attendance upon an extra or called session. Report made by Cobb of Indiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But this is for this session.

Mr. LYNCH. But we have already had the mileage for this session. That same question was up the next year in the Senate at the extra session of Congress, and the discussion will be interesting. It is very brief, and I will call attention to the remarks made on that point. When the judicial, executive, and legislative appropriation bill was before the Senate at that time Senator Plumb, of Kansas, offered the following amendment:

For mileage of Senators at the extra session, $36,000.

For mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories at the extra session, $100,000.

There was a discussion on the construction of this law by the Senators which I have no doubt members who desire to follow the law would like to hear, and those that do not desire to appropriate money that does not belong to them. In that debate Senator Wallace said:

But, sir, the Senator from Kansas says that the amendment he proposes is a measure that ought to be passed now. We have had the subject under consideration in committee, and we think it ought not to be done now. On the contrary, we think the statute which provides for the payment of mileage only for regular sessions, and under which the Representatives and Senators have been paid only for regular sessions, should continue to be held to be the law. It is true that for extra sessions of the Senate mileage has been appropriated to the new Senators who came to those extra sessions; but the law does not cover cases in which there has been an extra session of Congress called, because the statute of 1856, which is now the law, provides that mileage shall only be paid for each regular session. This is certainly not a regular session. The proposition, then, is to repeal the statute as it stands to-day, and under which mileage has always heretofore been paid, and to add to the expenses of the Government $136,000. But upon the other ground, that the amendment is clearly not in order, I think the Senate ought to refuse to pass it.

Mr. BAYARD. If I rightly comprehend the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kansas, it is to give two mileages this one year to the entire Senate and House. Is not that the effect?

Mr. PLUMB. The effect of the amendment is to give mileage to every member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives for the extra session of Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well. I am willing that all the gentlemen who came to Congress and took their seats here on the 18th of March should receive the same mileage as if they had been in their seats here on the first Monday of last December. In other words, that the single mileage provided by law should be received by them as it has been by those persons who were here during the last session, but not more. I do not propose to vote in favor of doubling my own mileage, but I am willing to vote in favor of their receiving a single mileage as we have done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not agree with the view favored by those who sustained the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The members who came here on the 18th of March will receive during this Congress for the two regular sessions the same mileage that the rest of us get. I am not willing to discriminate and say that Mr. A, a member of the Senate, shall have three mileages and Mr. B shall only have two. I think we had better vote down the whole proposition. We are paid annually for our services, in the estimation of some gentlemen very liberally, in the estimation of others not enough, but the law is that we shall get $5,000 a year and mileage. Perhaps the country thinks it is much more than we earn. In my judgment we had better vote down this whole proposition.

Mr. HILL of Georgia. I hope the Senate will vote down this whole amendment. I think it is all wrong. Members of Congress get $5,000 a year and mileage for one regular session. I do not propose to accumulate the expenses because of extra sessions. I know that some noise is sometimes made that an extra session of Congress costs the Government so much. I think when members of Congress are paid by the year, if the interests of the country require that they should attend here a dozen times, they ought to attend upon their regular salary and not be increasing their pay on account of the number of extra sessions. I do not think anybody ought to have anything extra. This is my judgment about it. Half the year we are getting pay without service, anyway. That ought to be satisfactory. I hope this amendment will be voted down, and that everybody will be content with his regular salary and not ask for extra allowance because of extra sessions.

Mr. WALLACE. The Committee on Appropriations considered this subject, as I have already stated, and rejected the proposition. Heretofore when there were extra sessions of the Senate called, commencing on the 4th or 5th of March, in perhaps three cases there was money voted to pay the mileage of Senators who came in anew to the Senate. That is the only basis upon which this proposition can hang. Here is an entirely different proposition. Here is a proposition now to vote mileage to Senators and members of the past Senate and of the present and past House who are now in the House and Senate for the extra session, when the law provides that mileage shall be given only for one regular session. This proposition gives mileage for two sessions this year, and of course it increases largely the expenditures of the Government and we think it ought not to prevail.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. Is it not really a violation of the law to give two mileages to a man whose term happened to commence on the 4th or 5th of March, as to a Senator whose term commenced two years or four years ago?

Mr. WALLACE. Two wrongs never made one right, and if a past Congress gave to Senators under those circumstances mileage it is no reason why those who did not come here should get additional pay, or why we should extend over the wide field of the whole of the House this provision to give them an additional mileage. The law is that we shall have mileage for each regular session. This proposition is to repeal the law and to give mileage for two sessions this year.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I hope it will be my fortune to spend one Congress in public life without having the members of either branch engaged in a discussion about their own pay. Congress, from the necessity of the case, is intrusted with the power o fixing its own compensation. No other public officer is intrusted with that power. If it were possible to help it, Congress would not be, I suppose. The discussion is always a disagreeable one. It is disagreeable to the public. It involves the charge upon the members of each branch of being governed by low personal motives in their action in regard to a public question, and it seems to me the only wise policy is when the matter has once got fixed by a general law, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has so well said this has, to let it pass into ancient history and not to touch it.

The public mind is reasonably content with the present compensation which is established by law. If we undertake to disturb it in any particular it will be disturbed and discussed in other particulars, and we shall have a repetition of, I will not say the scandals, but the disagreeable and unfortunate discussion and public excitement which attended the bill known as the back-pay bill a few years ago. Congress has fixed the rule of one mileage a year and a stated salary. The public has acquiesced in it, and I hope we shall pass from that question and that it will not be touched again for a hundred years in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Plumb].
The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LYNCH. Certainly.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman calls attention to the fact that it would be interesting to the members to hear this discussion as it was had in the Senate. Now, the fact is, is it not, that the discussion that you are reading from was a discussion as to the rules?

Mr. LYNCH. Not at all, sir. A point of order was involved in the discussion, but that is wholly immaterial in the consideration of the question pending now.

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir; and it was then held that it was within the rules; but when they voted upon the measure they defeated the amendment. If you would enforce this argument, which you are using as an argument, you ought to know as a matter of fact that it was determined that it was within the rule, but that when they came to vote for the amendment, they defeated it.

Mr. LYNCH. The point of order was raised whether it could be offered as an amendment to that bill under the rules of the Senate, which are different from ours.

Mr. HAYES. Exactly.

Mr. LYNCH. That was discussed. Now, I have not read the discussion upon the point of order. I have only read so much of it as applies directly to this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. The Chair understands the gentleman is reading a discussion held in the Senate as to the propriety of paying Members and Senators mileage for an extra session, or a regular session?

Mr. LYNCH. A regular session and an extra session—the discussion covered both. This is for the regular session.

The CHAIRMAN. But the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES] is to pay the members of this House and Senators their mileage for this session of Congress. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin upon that point.

Mr. LYNCH. The language of the resolution passed by this House on the 4th day of last August, was as follows:

Resolved, That the appropriation for mileage for Senators and members of the House and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1894, approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Does anybody claim that it was not the money that was payable at this time that was used at that time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The words "in lieu of" were in the original resolution, but were stricken out.

Mr. LYNCH. I know that, but the resolution itself shows that this money was appropriated by the appropriation act approved March 3, 1893, for this regular session, and makes it available at the extra session instead of this. It simply gave us the money in August instead of December.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If that was the intention, why were those words stricken out?

Mr. LYNCH. It is immaterial why they were stricken out. We can not take advantage of our own act. We used the money at that time which was appropriated for this session, and any attempt to get another mileage is simply another attempt to get back pay, as was done in 1873. The law is very plain and very distinct. We took the mileage that had been appropriated for this session and used it then, so that a new and additional appropriation will be necessary to make good the amount that was used at that time. I am aware that this is a very unpopular doctrine to advocate. [Laughter.] I can see that gentlemen are all anxious to get a chance to vote this appropriation to themselves, but there will be a day of reckoning. I warn you, gentlemen, there will be a day of reckoning if you vote to pay yourselves two mileages in one year when the law gives you only one. There will be an accounting. This is not the time for extras, but rather for economy.

A MEMBER. Will you take it if it is voted?

Mr. LYNCH. I will determine that at the proper time.

This appropriation can not be justified under the law nor by any precedent in Congress. Two extra sessions have been held since the enactment of 1868, under which we entered upon the duties of our office. At one session the House attempted to appropriate extra mileage, and at another the Senate. Both Houses emphatically declared against the legality and propriety of so doing, and it remains for this House to establish the precedent now.

Practically, it is the same as if we voted a double salary for this year, and no attempt to construe the resolution of August 14 so as to permit this appropriation can satisfy the people that we are not voting to ourselves double mileage for this year. When we came here in August there was no provision of law nor precedent of any former Congress under which we could claim the mileage for this year. It appeared that the mileage due in December could be made available at that time, and a resolution for that purpose was passed. The discussion that took place at the time of the consideration could not affect the law as it stood, nor our duty as members.

By practically an unanimous vote, the money due us in December was made available in August, hence the appropriation to pay mileage was exhausted, and nothing remained for the regular session. Now it is claimed that the resolution of August 14 was practically an appropriation of that amount of money, when on its face it simply provided for paying the money in August that was payable in December, at the regular session. No mere play upon words will satisfy the scrutinizing public that this is not an attempt to vote ourselves extra mileage.

Had it been intimated during the consideration of the resolution in August that it was intended to be a separate appropriation as mileage for the extra session, a different discussion would have taken place at that time. I certainly understood, and I believe others did, that we were simply authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to pay us the mileage due in December, at that time. I had reason to believe that to be the case, because it was the law.

This measure, if proper at all, should be by bill referred to committee and come up for consideration on its merits and not be hitched onto a bill which we all know must pass. Coming up as it does for consideration as an amendment to an important deficiency bill it can not and will not be considered on its merits.

At the outset we were given to understand that this Congress would be one of retrenchment and economy. Much had already been accomplished in that way and appropriations in many instances reduced, perhaps unjustly. I submit to all the members the questionable propriety of making the first extravagant appropriation for the benefit of the members of the House. The passage of this amendment will contrast very favorably or unfavorably, as you may choose to consider it, with the action of the House at the last Congress whereby sixteen committee clerks, that had been regularly employed by each successive Congress for ten years or more, had been dropped in order to save the magnificent sum of $12,000. It was a saving of that sum at that session, and this is an appropriation of $175,000 to members for this. But it will be done by an overwhelming majority, and the Democratic party will have to bear the responsibility.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, a consideration of the present law in relation to the mileage of members, and a very little of the history of legislation on that subject will, I think, be convincing in regard to this point of order, and will show that this is not new legislation, and that this proposition is in nowise making a law upon which to put an appropriation, but that it simply provides for an appropriation under existing law. In 1866 Congress passed a law in regard to the pay of members of Congress, and in regard to mileage, which is the law under which we are acting to-day. In 1873 Congress repealed that law and passed a new one, which has been commonly called the salary-grab law, in which the mileage was changed from so much per mile to reimbursement upon the member's statement of the sum actually expended for travel.

In 1874 that law was repealed, and in express terms the law as it existed previous to that time was reënacted. In other words, the law of 1866 was reaffirmed and thus reënacted, and as I said a while ago, that is the law under which we are acting to-day. Now that law provides that members shall be entitled to $5,000 a year compensation, and for mileage 20 cents per mile each way, going and coming, at "each regular session." The whole question consequently turns upon the meaning of the word "regular" in the expression "regular session" as contained in that law. To my mind there is no question about it, and I think a mere statement of the case will convince any one that the word "regular" is used merely with reference to a session of Congress reckoned from the time it commences until it adjourns without day to distinguish it from the daily session, or from a recess for any given number of days.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman point to any instance in the history of this Government where mileage has been allowed both for an extraordinary and for a succeeding regular session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman that question, and in the light of precedents thus established I ask him, does not the word "regular" rather mean that they shall receive mileage only once a year, as there can be but one regular session in the year.

Mr. HAYES. I think the statement I am about to make will fully answer that question. As I have said, the question turns upon the meaning of the word "regular" in the statute. I have stated what I deem to be the meaning of the word "regular" in that statute. In common parlance and even in the Senate debates we have heard different expressions used to describe the called session as "extra session," "special session," and others but there is no warrant in the laws or in the Constitution for those words or those expressions as applied to any session of Congress.

The Constitution provides three ways of convening Congress. One is by the provision of the Constitution itself, without the passage of any law to carry it into effect. Another is by the passage of a law as authorized by that provision of the Constitution, fixing some other or different day for the meeting. Then, third, the President upon extraordinary occasions is authorized to convene Congress; not to call an "extra session," or a "special session," but to "convene Congress;" and when Congress is convened in any one of these three ways, either under the Constitution, or under the law passed in pursuance of the Constitution, or by the President by proclamation, it is a regular session of Congress and there is no warrant whatever in law or in the Constitution for calling it an "extra" session or a "special" session, or anything of that kind. That, I repeat, has no warrant in the Constitution or the law.

As suggested by the gentleman from Georgia at my left [Mr. LIVINGSTON], if it was not a regular session no business could have been carried on except that which was incident to the purpose for which it was called. Such being the fact, this is a regular session of Congress, and the last session, or first session of the Fifty-third Congress, was a regular session. The law provides a certain amount of compensation and mileage for a regular session; and so far as the standpoint of the law is concerned, so far as our rules are concerned, there is no question about it.

This is not new legislation, or anything of that nature. Of course, back of all this there is a question of expediency—whether this proposition should be adopted or not. That is the simple question which was before the Senate at the time of the discussion which has been referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Senate first discussed the question whether under the rules the proposition was to be regarded as new legislation or was in order. They decided that it was not new legislation and in order, that it was a proper matter to be considered under the rules; and then having made that decision, they defeated the proposition on its merits. So here this proposition is not subject to a question of order under the rules; it is a question to be voted upon on its merits when that question is reached, and just as the Senate so held.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to read further on this very point from the debates in the Senate?

Mr. HAYES. There is one thing I had almost forgotten. This matter has been submitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and he has rendered a decision in relation to the question. Perhaps it might have been sufficient to have had his decision read, although he did not give any reason for it, and consequently did not give the true reason, which, it seemed to me, it was proper to state in order to put this matter rightly before the House and the country. I ask that the correspondence which I send to the desk be read.

Mr. CRAIN. Has the Attorney-General passed on this question?

Mr. HAYES. No, sir; not within my knowledge. The letter which I send to the desk is from the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1893.

SIR: I beg to call your attention to the fact there are no funds available to pay the mileage of Members of Congress and Delegates for the first regular session of the present Congress, and that an appropriation will be necessary to provide for the deficiency.

I submit herewith correspondence with the First Comptroller of the Treasury on this subject.

Respectfully submitted,

H. W. SNOW,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.
Washington, D. C., November 27, 1893.

SIR: Your decision is requested as to whether I will be authorized under the inclosed resolution, in paying mileage to the Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, Fifty-third Congress, without further resolution of the House authorizing it.

Respectfully,

H. W. SNOW,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Hon. R. B. BOWLER,
First Comptroller.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

[Public resolution—No. 3.]

Joint resolution making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1894, approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Approved, August 21, 1893.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 28, 1893.

SIR: I am in receipt of yours of the 27th instant, asking whether you will be authorized in paying mileage to Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, Fifty-third Congress, for their attendance at the approaching regular session without further action of Congress.

In reply thereto I would say that by section 17 of the act of July 28, 1866, which is the law governing mileage to be paid to members of Congress, they are to be allowed "20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session." As the approaching session is the regular session authorized by law, under the provisions of said section Representatives and Delegates are entitled to receive their usual mileage.

The resolution approved August 21, 1893, making immediately available the appropriation for the payment of mileage for the fiscal year 1894 and authorizing such payment to be made for attendance upon the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, did not impliedly repeal this provision, but simply authorized the payment of mileage for attendance upon the late extraordinary session.

As no new appropriation has been made for mileage, the amount of $130,000 appropriated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1893, can not be exceeded. You will, therefore, have to govern yourself accordingly.

Respectfully yours,

R. B. BOWLER, Comptroller.

The Hon. HERMAN W. SNOW,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to confine his remarks to the point of order bearing on the question of payment of mileage at a regular session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the question of order is the only question now before the committee. I trust, sir, that gentlemen will listen to this discussion for a few moments. The question assumes a great deal more interest and importance from the fact that this is a measure which concerns ourselves. It is not a case where we are acting impartially in a matter of general legislation; it is a case affecting our own interest—concerning us and nobody else, except the taxpayers of the country. I sincerely hope, therefore, that this question will be seriously considered.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that the traveling opinion of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, an opinion unauthorized by law, an opinion given by him with no case before him, can have no weight whatever in this matter. Yet, so far as it goes, it is in direct conflict with the position taken by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAYES]. His position is that all sessions of Congress are regular.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear any discussion upon the merits of this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not saying a word except on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear what the gentleman may have to say upon the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all I am undertaking to discuss. I am not saying one word about the merits. I hope there will be enough order in the Committee of the Whole to allow the Chair to hear what I am saying, for this is a question for the Chair.

The gentleman from Ohio assumes that all sessions of Congress are regular sessions—sessions called by Executive order as well as those provided for by law. The Comptroller knocks the bottom out of that position very effectually; for he speaks about the appropriation made for the "regular session."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not entering upon the merits of this proposition when I discuss this question as to what constitutes a regular session. The question has been before Congress over and over again. It is an adjudicated question. There have been twelve special sessions of Congress called by Presidents of the United States. Since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor there have been four special sessions of Congress. And not until the present hour have I ever heard the suggestion that there was not a broad distinction between an extraordinary session of Congress, called by the President of the United States, and a session of Congress authorized by law.

And when the language "regular session of Congress" is used in the statute, certainly the Chair must understand that language as meaning a session of Congress authorized by law—not such a session as the President of the United States is authorized to call. Such, for instance, as the first session of this Congress.

Mr. HAYES. They are all authorized by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Those called by the President have from the foundation of the Government been called extra sessions, extraordinary sessions, or called sessions. The appropriation for mileage for the present year is simply in the following terms, under the head of "House of Representatives:"

For mileage, $130,000.

Simply that. Nothing more was required, for the law of 1866 fixed this question; determined when the mileage should be paid; it was to be paid at regular sessions of Congress. In view of the broad distinction between a regular session and an extraordinary session, does any gentleman claim that that appropriation was intended to be applicable at the first session of this Congress? If that session was a regular session within the meaning of the law, how then did it become necessary that a joint resolution should be passed to make that appropriation available for the payment of mileage for the extra session beginning on the 7th day of last August? As the Chair must see, as every gentleman must see, there was no necessity at all for the passage of that joint resolution if the position now taken by the gentleman from Iowa is correct.

I again call attention to the terms of the appropriation on this subject. The appropriation of mileage for the last session of the last Congress was in these simple terms:

For mileage, $130,000.

Can the Chair, then, have any doubt that appropriations made in pursuance of this act of 1866, in the words which have already been read during this discussion, namely, providing mileage "for each regular session of Congress," and fixing the rate at 20 cents per mile—can the Chair, I say, in view of the language of that statute, "each regular session," assume for an instant that a proposition for the payment of this mileage for three sessions in place of two is in order?

Now, the Chair must take it for granted that the appropriation of money made by the appropriation bill of the last session of the last Congress was for the regular session of Congress which began according to law on the first Monday of the present month of December. There could be no possible mistake about that. It was an appropriation of money in conformity with the act of 1866 to be paid to the members as mileage for the first regular session of this Congress. What is the effect of this joint resolution? I brought it before the House:

That the appropriation for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1893 be, and the same is hereby, made available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

The effect of that resolution was to pay in advance the money which was appropriated for the mileage at the regular session. Now, to come right to the point, the appropriation was made under the act of 1866 in general terms, and under that act would apply only to the regular session. But an extraordinary session of Congress was called, and determined that instead of this mileage being paid at the regular session it should be paid in advance at an earlier time. That is the whole of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair has endeavored to give as much time to the discussion as the present condition of public business would justify.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the Chair, if I may be permitted to suggest it, will take cognizance of the fact that this is rather a delicate question, affecting, as it does, ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will indulge the gentleman as long as he confines himself to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not said a word outside of it. It is probable that in the midst of the confusion prevailing on the floor the Chair did not understand what I said; but I have not said a word outside of the question of order—not one.

I might call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the appropriation referred to was made under the provisions of the act of 1866. Does any gentleman deny that? Does the gentleman from Iowa deny it?

That act, if the Chair will permit me to refer to it again, provides mileage for the regular sessions of Congress only. That means sessions of Congress held under the law, and mileage during the Congress, which means two terms. The appropriation is made then for the first regular session of this Congress in the last year's appropriation bill, and the House of Representatives meeting earlier than the regular session makes it applicable at an earlier day. Can any lawyer say in view of the facts—taking into consideration the act of 1866 and the appropriation act of the last session of the last Congress—that if Congress makes the appropriation applicable at an earlier date it changes the act of 1866?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana, even admitting the force of all the gentleman has stated, why the Chair should not entertain the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and submit it to the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, because there is no law authorizing the appropriation and the rule of the House forbids it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin why should the Chair refuse to submit the question to the House? Under what rule is it inadmissible?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the manifest reason assigned in the rule read by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the appropriation can not be made unless in pursuance of law.

Now we have made the appropriation in pursuance of law. Can any gentleman deny that? And gentlemen have received their mileage in advance under that appropriation. Does any gentleman deny that? We have made it by the legislative act of the last session of the last Congress, providing $130,000 for that purpose. We have made it then in pursuance of law, but at an earlier date than the regular meeting of Congress—Congress being then in session—this appropriation was made applicable.

Does that change the case at all? Why, this is an appropriation for the regular session. We simply authorize its payment in advance of the regular session. Does that create a new law? I repeat, the appropriations are made in pursuance of the act of 1866, which has not been modified or changed, and Congress only authorized its payment at an earlier date. As a legal proposition it is too clear for discussion. Under the rules of the House and the act of 1866, as well as the appropriation made by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of the last session of the last Congress, it is clear that we have simply expedited the receipt of the money appropriated by that Congress for this purpose. I repeat, it is too clear for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order. The Chair desires the Clerk to read the clause of the act of 1866 to which reference has been made.

By the 17th section of the act of July 28, 1866, it is provided that mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session of Congress, shall be allowed to each Representative and Delegate the accounts thereof to be certified by the Speaker. (Stat., vol. 14, page 323.)

The CHAIRMAN. Now, neither the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH], nor the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], nor any gentleman on the floor has raised the point that this is not a regular session of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a regular session of Congress, but——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make his own statement, and will hear the gentleman afterward. This is a regular session of the Fifty-third Congress of the United States. Now, it is true that a session known as a called, or extra, session of the Fifty-third Congress met and adjourned, and pending that session of Congress certain proceedings bearing upon this question took place. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the proceedings relating to a resolution offered early in that session by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the action of the House upon that resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILEAGE OF SENATORS, REPRESENTATIVES, AND DELEGATES.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Joint resolution (S. R. 3) making immediately available the appropriation for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, etc., That the appropriation for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1894, approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress: Provided, That payments hereunder shall be in lieu of mileage authorized by law for attendance at the first regular or the next session of the Fifty-third Congress."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is in order anyhow, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The only reason why the Chair asked unanimous consent was, that an order was adopted by the House in relation to the pending bill which seems to assign all the time to its consideration until the period when the vote should be taken. Therefore the Chair did not feel that, without consent, he could interrupt or take away any part of the time which had been agreed upon for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. This resolution simply makes available now the appropriation which was made for the next session.

Mr. POWERS. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose this called session should not continue very long, as the country hopes it will not. Suppose, for instance, having acted upon the financial question, having repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman bill, and having given the banks the right to issue circulation up to the par value of their bonds; suppose we should get away by the 1st of October, does the gentleman's joint resolution propose that we shall not have mileage for coming to this extra session, to which we have been called properly by the President of the United States, and not by any act of ours?

Mr. HOLMAN. This measure does not prejudge that subject. It leaves it all open.

[Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. It appears to me that it does prejudge it. I think the gentleman should have offered a joint resolution giving us our mileage and also allowing us the usual amount for stationery.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is provided for already.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. For the extra session?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, this may not be an extra session. We can not positively answer as to how long we will be in session.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. It was called as an extra session. Now, I do not know but we may desire to have stationery, and we ought to be allowed to have a settlement for that, if we should sit here for a couple of months.

Mr. COOMBS. You can get the stationery allowance now.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I have seen the same thing done before at a called session, and I simply rise to say that in my opinion the joint resolution ought to refer only to the extra session, and not apply in any way to the regular session in December, for the country wants us to get out of this session as soon as we can—to adjourn long before the first Monday of December.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I had thought, Mr. Speaker, that any objection was to be raised, I would not have offered the resolution. The question to which my friend has referred will come before the House for consideration at a later time. For the present this seems to be the safer course to pursue.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman consent to amend by striking out the words "in lieu of?"

Mr. HOLMAN. I would not like to do that at present.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. And let the resolution read without that proviso concerning the regular session?

Mr. HOLMAN. That comes up later.

Mr. REED. It always comes up later.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. As the question has been brought up, we might as well settle it here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the words "in lieu of."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on the resolution in its present form.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. You can not call the previous question when I have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution gives satisfaction to those gentlemen who have examined it.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I insist on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rather than consume the time of proper debate I prefer to withdraw the measure.

Mr. REED. Withdraw it, then.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that striking out the three words "in lieu of" would not accomplish the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I want to strike out all the words necessary to make this really apply to the session that might unfortunately continue until December.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please present his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had called the previous question, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has, however, been recognized and understood that he had the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman from Indiana had better let this lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the resolution to whatever action the House deems proper.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Then I move to strike out the words which by implication extends this to the December session.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please indicate those words?

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the words "in lieu of" and the words following.

The SPEAKER. That does not accomplish the purpose sought. The gentleman will please look at the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Let the resolution be reported again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can examine the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the proviso.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution, so that the House may understand what it is.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the proviso.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the proviso.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 91, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, it is evident from the action of the House upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the mileage that had been provided for in the last appropriation bill was paid to members for the first session of the Fifty-third Congress. As a matter of fact that money was, as appropriated, paid to each member, according to what he was entitled to under the law. And the question raised by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES] is simply to pay the mileage of members for this, the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, which is, according to the interpretation given to it by some gentlemen, the first regular session. But the Chair, in determining this point of order, has nothing to do with the proposition as to whether the first session of this Congress was a regular or an extraordinary session. The House is confronted with the fact that by the action of the House itself the appropriation made to pay the mileage of members was paid to them for their attendance on the first session of this Congress; and the fact remains that no appropriation exists at this time to pay mileage for the attendance of members upon this session, which all gentlemen concede to be a regular session of Congress. The Chair overrules the point of order, and will submit the amendment to the House.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have a word to say about this question of mileage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman——

Mr. BLAND. I am not appealing, but I understand the proposition is now before the committee for its adoption or rejection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to suspend for a moment to allow the committee to rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the board of Capitol police be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint twelve additional policemen at an annual salary of $1,100 each, one-half to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items of the respective Houses until otherwise provided for.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The committee having risen informally, merely for the purpose of receiving a message from the Senate, it will require unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Ways and Means. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman to submit his report.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I wish to say that at the earliest practicable moment——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, the minority of the committee on Ways and Means desire to ask time to file their views.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that leave will be granted.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman indicate within what time they will file their report?

Mr. BURROWS. I think within two days.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the minority of the committee will be permitted to file their views, and when filed they will be printed.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Within two days.

The SPEAKER. Within two days.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask permission to state to the House that I shall ask the House at the earliest practicable day——

Mr. GEAR. It ought not to be made an order, it strikes me, that the views of the minority must be filed absolutely within two days.

Mr. DALZELL. That is no part of the leave.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I understand that to be a part of the permission, of course.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no trouble about that here.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to state to the House that I shall ask the House, at the earliest practicable day, to proceed to the consideration of this bill, of which time I shall give notice beforehand.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, what was the proposition?

The SPEAKER. There was no proposition.

Mr. REED. What is the proposition in regard to the filing of the views of the minority?

The SPEAKER. The minority has two days in which to file their views.

Mr. REED. I think there is no reason why the minority should be limited to two days.

The SPEAKER. That was at the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. GEAR. It was "possibly two days."

Mr. REED. I suggest that the minority have leave in general to file their views. They expect to file them within that period.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked that the majority, without limit, be allowed to file their views.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I supposed the understanding between the majority and the minority was that the minority would file their report within two days. It was expected that they would be ready to-day.

Mr. REED. I presume there will be no objection to having the order made general.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask that the minority file their views within two days.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman insist upon that?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes. (After a pause.) That was the proposition made by the minority of the committee.

Mr. REED. It was not a proposition made. It was stated that we expected to do that. That was all, as I understand it. It was an expression of opinion. That was all we meant to say. We have no idea of delaying beyond the earliest possible moment to file the report, but would not like to agree that there should be a limit of two days imposed.

Mr. BURROWS. What occurred is within the knowledge of every member of the House.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I will not insist upon that being a part of the agreement. I shall ask that our friends do file their report within two days. That was a part of their proposition.

Mr. BURROWS. I simply stated that I asked consent or leave that the minority may file their views. The gentleman from West Virginia then inquired within what time, to which I replied probably within a couple of days.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, leave will be extended to the minority to file their views; and when filed they will be printed.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCRAE. That does not imply that the printing of the report shall be delayed until the filing of the views of the minority?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

FURTHER URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee then resumed its session, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky made a separate point of order to the two paragraphs embraced in this amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I do not care to press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The amendment is now before the committee for its action.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of taking exception to the ruling, because I think the Chair has ruled according to the situation. But, Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the law itself authorizes the payment of only one mileage; and that is for the regular session. After the House had met in August last, after we saw proper to anticipate that mileage and draw it for that session, I suppose that is all you can construe it to be; we might do so, but that is all that ought to be done.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I have attended three extra sessions of Congress, and I have never known a single Congress that has drawn its mileage for an extra session. We have always confined ourselves, so far as my memory goes, to one mileage, and that was for the regular session. Are we, Mr. Chairman—a party that has come here pledged to retrenchment and the reduction of taxation, a reduction of expenditures, when the whole country is in financial difficulties, probably much of it owing to the action of the extra session of Congress in depriving the people of this country in part at least of the means by which to pay their taxes—are we, in view of this fact, now determined to do this which, so far as my memory goes, for the last twenty years has never been done by Congress, that is, to pay two mileages in one year?

This House, Mr. Chairman, is pledged to a reduction of taxation; to a reduction of expenditures, wherever we can, all along the line of the President's message, in that regard which insists that we must reduce them wherever they can be reduced, withholding appropriations where it can be done without crippling the public service.

Are we to come here and, simply because we can put mileage in our pockets, are we to loot the public Treasury? It will be a disgrace upon this House if we should do so. Gentlemen need not suppose that the country which has sent us here to reduce taxation will not condemn every man who votes to put in his pocket the hard-earned money of the people that does not belong to him. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this side of the House can not afford to proceed in this way. The Republican party, when it was in power, never undertook to do it, and yet we have charged them with extravagance. The records will show that for the last twenty or twenty-five years, although we have had extra sessions, we have not drawn mileage for one of the extra sessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate close at half past 4. That will give us twenty minutes more. We want to pass the bill this afternoon.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is $175,000 for ourselves involved in this bill, and I insist upon reasonable debate. I insist upon at least an hour.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in half an hour from this time.

Several MEMBERS. Make it twenty minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Twenty minutes, then.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Kentucky is making a great mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendments be closed in twenty minutes——

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. One moment, Mr. Chairman. I want to hear what the venerable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. I simply wish to say to my venerable friend from Kentucky [laughter] that I hope he will act with his customary fairness and coolness in this matter.

While Mr. HOLMAN was still on the floor,

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore put the question upon the motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky to close debate in twenty minutes and declared it carried. [Laughter and confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HATCH). The Chair can not recognize any gentleman in such confusion. [After a pause.] By order of the committee all debate upon the pending paragraphs and amendments thereto will close in twenty minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say there was some misunderstanding. I had moved to make the time thirty minutes, and I think that, with the consent of the committee, under the circumstances it would be well to let the debate run for that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto close in thirty minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish at the outset to enter my protest against the discourtesy just shown to members of the House by the gentleman who occupied the Chair a few moments ago. I wish to enter my protest against it, sir, as especially unbecoming when we are legislating for ourselves, for the benefit of our own pockets, legislation in sharp antagonism with the principles which have controlled Congress for a century, except on two occasions, and the Democrats when in the control of Congress in all our history except in one instance.

Can we afford, gentlemen, in the midst of such a tumult as this, to vote to ourselves, out of the hard earnings of our people this extra mileage of $130,000, and extra stationery to the amount of $45,000, and arbitrarily limit debate to thirty minutes? Will our people tolerate such a raid on their Treasury by their Representatives?

I saw just such a scene as this as far back as 1862, and again in 1873, when the retroactive-salary law was passed. There was a called session of the Congress on the 4th of July, 1861, at the opening of the late war, the most important extra session of Congress ever held in this country. At the next session, the regular session, this same mileage question came up, and I wish to bring to your attention, gentlemen, the conduct of the men who preceded you in this Hall nearly a generation ago. When the proposition was brought forward at the regular session, as now, to pay mileage for the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, the famous war session, which had not been paid, the House became so indignant at the attempt to violate all the precedents of the past as to mileage that they not only refused to vote the mileage, but they passed a bill to abolish the mileage of members of Congress altogether. You will find that record in the proceedings of the first regular session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, July 15, 1862.

Mr. HAYES. Was that in 1866?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; it was in July, 1862, during the first regular session of the Thirty-seventh Congress. By reference to the record, I find that such men as Charles Wickliffe of Kentucky, and Roscoe Conkling of New York, with eighty-six other members of that House, voted to abolish mileage entirely, so indignant were they at the pretensions of some gentlemen who, in violation of all the precedents, were demanding mileage for the extra session as well as for the regular session. There is scarcely a man who was conspicuous in your legislative history thirty years ago who is not found on the list of those voting in favor of abolishing mileage. The measure did not pass the Senate, but the record was no less honorable to the House.

I find in the record with great satisfaction that I then voted to abolish mileage for members of the House and Senate. In the first place, gentlemen, we are doing here what no Congress has ever done before. There have been twelve called sessions of Congress in our history, and during President Johnson's Administration there were several adjourned sessions of Congress; but never has a dollar been paid to members for mileage except for a regular session.

In the last session of the last Congress you appropriated the necessary amount of money for mileage for this session, I think $175,000. I brought into the House at the beginning of the called session of this Congress a joint resolution providing that this money should be paid to the Senators and Members in advance. That resolution passed both Houses unanimously. We received the money in advance, and now gentlemen insist that they shall be paid their mileage again. This has never been done in our history. I hope a Democratic House will not sanction this new departure from the path of economy and justice to our people. This is a personal matter. Can we afford to set this example? Will our constituents approve of such action? We all know that the mileage at 20 cents a mile is more than three times as much as we expend in coming and going with our families to and from this capital. Gentleman say this money paid for mileage at the called session was not for the regular session.

Every one of you know it was appropriated for the regular session—this session—and that you simply by joint resolution anticipated the payment at the special session—nothing more.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Democratic party has any one element of strength among the people above all others it is the general belief indulged in through all the years of the past from the days of Jefferson that it is a party of economy, who mindful that every dollar in the Treasury is placed there by the labor of our people, a party that frowns down and denounces mercenary motives in the action of a Government and especially of the great legislative body of our country. Yet within two years, if you will pass this bill, you will have added to the pay of members of Congress sums of money beyond any example in our history except in the case of the salary act of March 3, 1873. You remember the fate of that measure. Have you considered that, gentlemen?

Within two years we have provided clerks for members, not chairmen of committees, at a cost of about $360,000 a Congress, and now extra mileage $130,000, and extra stationery $45,000 as proposed by this amendment. See, gentlemen, what a record we are making.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the House for only a moment or two; I will not occupy five minutes. I agree with the position taken by those who favor this amendment, that, strictly and technically speaking, the members of this House are entitled to mileage under the law as it now exists. I believe that is so. I shall therefore speak as to the policy of making the appropriation. If I have not been misinformed, ever since the organization of this Government, since the meeting of the very first Congress, at no time and under no circumstances did members of Congress receive mileage both for an extraordinary session and for the regular session next succeeding. That is my understanding of the history of this matter from the very organization of the Government. I do not think that we should at this date break the precedent so long and so uniformly regarded.

Now, it is well known to every one here that, with the exception of members residing within from 50 to 100 miles of this city, the allowance of 40 cents a mile—20 cents coming and 20 cents returning—is largely more than sufficient to pay the traveling expenses of any member. It does occur to me that, in view of this large allowance of mileage, members of the House ought to be content with receiving mileage once a year. I shall therefore vote against the appropriation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. How will the newly elected member from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] get his mileage if it be not voted now? And how will the successors of Mr. O'Neill and Gen. Lilly, of Pennsylvania, and Judge Chipman, of Detroit, obtain their mileage?

Mr. SAYERS. There are exceptions to all rules. Those gentlemen have not received mileage heretofore, and they are justly entitled to mileage.

Mr. CRAIN. Their predecessors have received mileage.

Mr. SAYERS. But they do not stand exactly in the shoes of their predecessors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before I came to Congress, and especially before I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I frequently heard the phrase "the old flag and an appropriation." It occurs to me that this order has been reversed: that now the "appropriation" comes first and the "old flag" afterward. I am aware that nothing I may say on this occasion will prevent a vote in favor of this appropriation. [Laughter.] I leave the question with the House, and shall vote against the amendment providing for mileage.

Mr. BLAND addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, we understand full well the condition of the public Treasury to-day. We are told—I do not know whether it is true or not—that propositions will be made to issue bonds for the purpose of getting money to meet the ordinary expenditures of this Government. Now, I want to know whether there is a member of this House who, knowing as I know that the law contemplates the payment of mileage only once a year and at a regular session and that we appropriated our mileage at the extra session, intends to put a bonded indebtedness upon the people of this country, with the burden of taxation necessary to meet those bonds, in order to put into his own pocket money that does not belong to him?

We remember the "salary grab" of the Republican party which almost swept it out of existence in the elections which followed. Here is a "salary grab"—not quite so large, but as infamous—and the man who votes for it or takes it after it is voted ought to be defeated as the "salary grabbers" were.

I do not believe, with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS], that this House is going to commit such an infamy as to adopt this proposition. I can not believe it. It is not proper for anyone to suppose that this House, in the present condition of the Treasury and with the long line of precedents in the past, is going to commit a deed that will damn it, if it is not already damned. I am afraid probably it is damned anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the spirit manifested by members in the consideration of such a measure as this, particularly a measure concerning the members and their pockets only. This is the first time since I have been a member that I have seen the attempt made to stifle debate upon a proposition carrying an appropriation of $175,000 payable to the members individually; a proposition contrary to law and contrary to the precedents of the House for more than a hundred years. Yet in the face of positive law under which we all came here, it is proposed to shut off debate and to heap ridicule upon the attempt to confine ourselves to the law under which we entered upon the duties of our offices. I say that the situation is astonishing. The ruling of the Chair was astonishing. [Laughter.]

More so than anything else; and particularly the conclusion, where the Chair bases its decision upon the resolution of August 14, as taking the money appropriated for this regular session and appropriating it for that, when the language of the resolution distinctly states that the money due for mileage under the act of March 3, 1893, was payable at the regular session, and the resolution of August 14 simply made that money available in August instead of December. The language of that resolution is clear and unequivocal. It neither made an appropriation nor implied that another appropriation might or should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] that in accordance with the rules of the House the gentleman from Wisconsin must be regarded as having acquiesced in and affirmed the ruling of the Chair; otherwise he would have taken an appeal from the decision. The Chair will say further to the gentleman that his remarks are not only not in order, but are unbecoming a member on the floor when he knows that the Chair is bound by the rules of the House, and is endeavoring to observe them. I know how futile would be any attempt by appeal to change the ruling.

Mr. LYNCH. I know that the members of this House are going to vote this appropriation; I can see it from the spirit manifested on both sides, and particularly on the Republican side. [Laughter.] Well, gentlemen, you may laugh: now is the time to laugh: later on you may find it to be no laughing matter. He laughs best who laughs last. I do not question the power of the House to make this appropriation. You can appropriate to each member a thousand dollars apiece as well as you can appropriate this sum. There is no limit in that respect; the House has the power to make this appropriation if it wants to exercise it. But the haste and zeal with which they seek to do it is astonishing to say the least of it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion on the floor that we can not hear the gentleman. If we are going to steal this money let us do it in order and with decency. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has appealed to the House to preserve order and will endeavor to enforce it.

Mr. COGSWELL (to Mr. SIMPSON). Are you in favor of the steal? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. No, I am not.

Mr. COGSWELL. But you are going to take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes, if you insist upon it. The Populists believe in putting money in circulation. [Laughter.]

Mr. LYNCH. I can not but refer to the support which was intended to press this matter on the House, as an opinion of the Attorney-General——

Mr. HAYES. No; of the Comptroller.

Mr. LYNCH. I understand so now, but I understood at first it was the report of the Attorney-General. It turned out to be simply a paper, a statement accompanying a reply to a letter written by some gentleman to the Attorney-General; but that gentleman was too good a lawyer to commit himself on the proposition of law involved, but substituted a letter from the Comptroller.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will state that he recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] on one side of this proposition, and they have consumed eighteen of the thirty minutes allowed by the committee. The Chair thinks it is only fair to recognize some gentleman on the floor who desires to support the amendment. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin again if no other gentleman desires to take the floor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, this question should be determined by the existing law. This Congress, or this House, at the present time is not engaged in passing a law determining that its members shall have another mileage. The pending proposition is one appropriating money to pay the mileage for the present session to which members are entitled under existing law.

Mr. COGSWELL. That is right.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This is the point exactly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the proposition were different, if it were an effort on our part to enact a law giving us another mileage when the existing law denied it to us, I would be the last man to raise my voice in support of it or to give it my vote. But that is not the proposition.

The members of this House were not responsible for the exercise of the constitutional power on the part of the President calling them in extra session in August last. He did call us in extra session and we came here in obedience to that call. That session lasted three months and adjourned a month before the regular session of Congress was to be held. Many of the members of this House, including myself, went to their homes during the period of adjournment. Then the time came for returning to Washington to attend the regular session. We came. It was the second trip to Washington to attend to the public business, and under existing law we are entitled to mileage for this second trip. There can be no question of that. The proper law officer—the First Comptroller of the Treasury—so decides. If this be true, let us have the manliness to vote the amount of money necessary to pay it and then take it like men. [Applause.]

You gentlemen who do not believe that you are entitled to the mileage will vote, of course, against the proposition. Now be consistent, and do not take it after it is appropriated by the votes of those of us who believe otherwise. [Laughter.]

All this talk, Mr. Chairman, about the condition of the Treasury and the impropriety of members being paid mileage to which they are entitled by existing law is buncombe. There is no trouble about finding money in the Treasury to meet the just obligations of the Government. Nor do I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the generous people of this country will find fault with their representatives for voting themselves money in the form of mileage, to which existing law, made before this Congress was elected, entitles them.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], admitted in his remarks, if I understood him correctly, that under the law as it stands we are entitled to the mileage now due. That is to say, that we are entitled to mileage for each session of Congress, and that it is only a question of policy whether we should now vote it or not. If the law entitles us to it, that law existed when we were elected, and our election to the present Congress carried with it all the emoluments and privileges appertaining to the position by the law existing at the date of our election. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SICKLES. I wish to ask if it be in order to ascertain by a rising vote the gentlemen who propose to refuse the acceptance of this mileage, in order that the amount of the appropriation might be reduced to that extent. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. I rise to say to the gentleman that I never will take a dollar of it, and I believe that the men who do take it, whether they vote for it or not, will be put in the same position as those men who voted an increase of salary in times past.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not fear that for one.

Mr. BLAND. We go upon the stump and come here and talk about the depleted Treasury, about reducing taxes, and say there is no money in the Treasury, and yet we come in now and loot that Treasury for our own pockets.

Mr. WELLS. It strikes me as a little peculiar that at this time, of all others, when there is an appropriation with no flag attachment, we hear nothing from the other side except cheers for the men who denounce those who are attempting to prevent a steal and a plundering of the Government. When the appropriation that has just been passed was before the House, we listened here with a great deal of consideration to the heavy artillery from Illinois, to the pyrotechnics of Iowa, and to the firecrackers from the sunrise district of Massachusetts, but we do not hear any of these gentlemen lift up their voices against this appropriation.

Mr. COGSWELL. Well, you will see us vote for it.

Mr. WELLS. Gentlemen, there is no use in talking, the American people are not in a humor to be plundered by this House, and a Democratic House at that. The law provides specifically that at every regular session each member is entitled to mileage, and that mileage covers more than the expense of four trips of any man from his place of abode to Washington. It is simply an outrage that it stands upon the statute books to-day, and that each of us is permitted by way of mileage to take of the hard earnings of the people of the United States that for which their children are suffering, and for which the people are starving in every large center of the country to-day. Those are the conditions that will confront gentlemen when they return to their constituents.

I remember, sir, that in the seventies, I have forgotten the year, gentlemen voted themselves upon the floor of this House an appropriation for back pay. Schuyler Colfax was amongst them. There were a number of Republicans amongst them; and it is of history, sir, that all of the Republicans who voted that back pay to themselves on this floor were returned and honored by their constituencies; but Democracy, ever honest, relegated to the shades of private life every man who took the back pay. And by the Eternal, if we take this we should be relegated to the shades of private life too. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that amendment is divisible. I believe there are two different propositions, and I call for a separate vote on each.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] calls for a division. The Clerk will read the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, after line 14, insert:

For mileage of members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $130,000, for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress.

For mileage of Senators for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, $45,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on this portion of the amendment.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HOLMAN) there were—ayes 143, noes 49.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the remaining portion of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery for members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories for the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, $45,000.

For stationery for Senators for the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, $20,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, on page 8, in line 22, I move to strike out the word "twenty" and insert the words "twenty-eight." In support of that amendment I submit the following letter from the Clerk's office:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1893.

DEAR SIR: To pay the salaries of employés, made payable out of the contingent fund by resolutions of the House, from December 7, 1893, to June 30, 1894, the following amounts will be required:

Resolutions of December 7, 1893:
E. L. Currier, $100 per month	$680.62
George Jenison, $100 per month	680.62
		$1,361.24
2 laborers, Clerk's office, $720 per annum		817.72
8 folders, Doorkeeper's office, $75 per month		4,083.76
1 messenger, post-office, $100 per month	680.62
1 laborer, post-office, $75 per month	510.47
		1,191.09
		7,453.81
Resolution of December 8, 1893:
Bert W. Kennedy, $900 per annum		508.68
Total		7,962.49

There is not a sufficient amount, unexpended, in the miscellaneous items out of which to pay any part of these salaries, and this item was not included in the $20,000 asked for by you for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund.

Very respectfully,

J. F. SNYDER,
Disbursing Clerk.

Hon. JAMES KERR,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, in line 22, strike out the word "twenty" and insert the words "twenty-eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. At this point I wish to offer an amendment in behalf of the committee, to be inserted immediately after the amendment we have just agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, after the amendment last adopted, insert:

"To pay W. Tyler Page, for clerical services under the Clerk of the House in the month of October and November, 1893, $250."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas now offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employés of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 3d day of November, 1893, including the Capitol police and the Official Reporters of the Senate and House, for extra services during the Fifty-third Congress a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make a point of order upon that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order upon that. There is no law authorizing that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas on the point of order. The point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Indiana is that it changes existing law, and there is no existing law under which the appropriations can be made. The Chair understands the point.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a similar resolution to this has been passed by the Forty-seventh, the Forty-eighth, the Fiftieth, the Fifty-first, and the Fifty-second Congresses, and also a resolution similar to this was passed at the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

It is no more than right that the clerks and officers should be paid this amount, and paid now. They have no mileage out of which to pay their expenses here when they are brought here. Another point; whenever the question was made and the point of order was raised, I am advised by members who have been here that it was always submitted by the Chair to the House. I suggest that this be done in this proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I suppose there is no doubt that this is obnoxious to the point of order. There is no law permitting it. The usage of the House has never been to do it until the close of the session. After the House has been in session a good long while it has been the rule of the House to give an extra month's pay, under the idea that the employés would have it for traveling expenses home and back. Otherwise most of the employés of the House would be confined to the District of Columbia or immediately around the city of Washington; but it has never been done in the middle of a session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 23, 1891, a very full and explicit decision of a certain Speaker of the House that no Democrat upon this floor will question, and that is Mr. Carlisle himself. The Clerk will read the small type. The Chair hopes the committee will be in order and listen to the decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hitherto on more than one occasion an amendment precisely similar or having the same purpose in view has been submitted to the House, and the most recent decision was that of the Speaker himself, who held the amendment to be in order. The Chair happens to have that decision before him and will ask the Clerk to read certain paragraphs from it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The SPEAKER. The Chair finds upon an examination of the records that on two occasions heretofore an amendment similar to this—the Chair thinks in precisely the same language—has been offered and a point of order made against it, and in both instances the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by a very large vote, held the provision to be in order.

"Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; but does that action of the Committee of the Whole establish a rule for the control of the House? It must be apparent, Mr. Speaker, there is no law authorizing this item.

"The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair is not absolutely bound by any decision of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, although such decision is certainly entitled to very great respect when the question has been discussed and decided by that committee, consisting as it does of the same members that compose the House itself. In order to preserve uniformity in the rulings upon this question the Chair thinks he ought to admit the amendment and allow the House to vote upon it.

"Mr. HOLMAN. And hold that there is a law authorizing this appropriation: that it comes within the third section of the twenty-first rule?

"The SPEAKER. The provision seems to have been held in order heretofore upon the ground that it had been included in an appropriation bill, and was the law at least for that year."

The CHAIRMAN. In pursuance of this decision of the former Speaker of the House, in ruling upon this identical question, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would be glad to have the amendment read again, because there was such confusion I could not hear it.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the right to the floor. The Chair recognized the gentleman on the point of order, and he is now entitled to be recognized on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I do not desire the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, why should the Capitol police and the annual employés be paid this sum? Now, it may be possible that there is a sort of justice in paying the session employés, who were kept here for the three months and then there was an adjournment and near a month of recess until the regular session. They were therefore placed in the dilemma of paying their expenses, of going home and coming back, or their boarding expenses here; but that does not apply to the annual roll.

It does not apply to those who get an annual salary. They had made arrangements. They had obtained pay for the entire year, and that does not put them on an equality with the session employés, but actually gives them an extra month's pay during one-half of the year during which they have performed services. I therefore think that if the committee should see fit to give the session employés an extra month's pay, they should not give it to the annual employés. I therefore move that amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to offer a substitute, if the gentleman will allow me, and have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers the following substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 8, and lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, on page 9, and insert the following:

"To pay the session employés of the House of Representatives from November 4 to December 3, 1893, both days inclusive—

33 pages, $2.50 per diem each, $75	$2,475.00
21 committee clerks, $8 per diem each, $180	5,780.00
2 assistant committee clerks, $6 per diem each, $180	360.00
1 assistant index clerk, $6 per day	180.00
3 messengers, post-office, $900 per session each, $114.81	344.43
4 messengers, post-office, $100 per month each, $99.67	398.68
3 folders, Doorkeeper's office, $70 per month each, $69.77	209.31
2 messengers, Doorkeeper's office, $70 per month each, $69.77	139.54
10 laborers, $60 per month each, $59.80	598.00
Total	8,484.96"

Mr. AITKEN. Will the gentleman tell us who are left out of this substitute?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if I can get order, I will undertake to explain this resolution. I offer it as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas. It provides for the pay of session clerks and officers and employés of the House during the recess—that is, from the 4th day of November until the 4th day of December. The bill itself provides for certain legislation in the line of my amendment, proposing to pay certain of these session employés.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But, if the gentleman will permit me to explain, they are men who actually did service, and the bill simply proposes to pay them for that service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; the committee selects certain session employés and puts them in this bill. Now, I am here to assert that I know that other employés who are included in the amendment which I propose rendered just as efficient and continuous service as the gentlemen provided for in this bill. One of them, I am prepared to say, is the clerk of the Committee on Printing. He remained here, 900 miles from home, during the entire session, and did the work of that committee during the recess, and he is just as much entitled to pay as any of those included in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations. I agree that the employés included in this bill ought to be paid, that they were here doing service, but I insist that others are equally entitled to be paid.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman has misrepresented the committee and used a word which is possibly susceptible of an offensive construction. He says that the committee "selected" certain persons. Now, the fact is that the committee had nothing whatever to do with selecting them. The Doorkeeper and other officers of the House selected them without the knowledge of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I will not quarrel with my friend from Kentucky on that point——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. We do not know and do not care who they are.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know you do not, nor do I know the names of all that are covered by my resolution; but I know that they are session employés who were kept here during the month of November.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But the gentleman's language seemed to imply that the committee had been partial in making selections.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I withdraw that. Now, I want to say that this amendment which I propose simply provides to pay the session employés who were kept here and did efficient work. Many of them I know, and it seems to me that they are just as much entitled to a month's pay as the parties who are included in this bill by the officers of the House whose suggestions were adopted by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. AITKEN. Whom do you leave out that were included in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I leave out the Capitol police. They get pay for the month of November. I leave out all the annual employés of this House who get pay for the month of November. I do not propose to adopt an amendment which provides for paying them twice for the month of November, as the resolution of the gentleman from Kansas does.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has given utterance to a statement which he probably would not have made if he had been acquainted with the facts. The employés for whom the Committee on Appropriations have recommended compensation are persons who were daily engaged in taking care of this Capitol. They were constantly employed every day in the week, except Sundays, in scrubbing the floors and corridors, in taking care of this Hall, and in other work, and the Committee on Appropriations thought it would not be improper to recommend the payment of those people who were so actively and continuously engaged in the service of Congress while Congress was not in session. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks as to his Committee on Printing, but was that committee in session during the recess?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, it was not; but the clerk was in session doing the committee's work. Was the House in session when your scrubbers were working?

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman was not here during the recess, and he does not know and can not tell how many hours a day his clerk worked.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Can you tell how many hours the session folders were employed, or the scrubbers and other employés?

Mr. SAYERS. Every day, except Sundays.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Can you tell how much of the time the messengers and employés were employed?

Mr. SAYERS. We had the report from the Doorkeeper of the House that every day——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make the report in this case as chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAYERS. But you do not report that your clerk was at work every day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I report that the room of the Committee on Printing was open every day——

Mr. SAYERS. That may have been.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And the clerk was at his desk performing his duties.

Mr. SAYERS. What did he do?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He did all that the clerk of that committee had to do.

Mr. SAYERS. What had he to do while Congress was in vacation? Please state that, if you can.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will, when you get through.

Mr. SAYERS. All that the Committee on Appropriations have done in this matter was simply this: The Doorkeeper was found to have had certain employés engaged in daily labor here during the vacation, and so was the Postmaster of the House. When they represented to the Committee on Appropriations that these employés had been engaged here every day except Sunday in manual labor, the committee thought it was only proper that we should recommend their payment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, as I said when I offered this amendment, I am a new member, but I have been informed that it has been customary to adopt a proposition of this kind, and it has been done at the different sessions of Congress which have been named. These gentlemen borne upon the annual pay roll were brought here to attend the extra session. During the month intervening between that and the regular session they were either kept here, away from their homes, or returning to their homes, they were obliged to pay their way there and back.

These men having been kept here during that month, or compelled to go to their homes and return at their own expense, it seems to me it is not right to refuse them this month's extra pay. Certainly if it has been the custom of the House to grant this allowance at previous sessions of Congress, I think it ought to be done at this session. I simply submit the question, asking members to vote upon it as they think best. I believe that all the officers included in the amendment which I have submitted ought to have this extra month's pay. I hope we shall vote down the substitute.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the last extra session of Congress prior to the one called last August was the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress; and I wish to state that during the time I have been here it has been customary at the conclusion of a session, or sometime during the session, to vote an extra month's allowance to the employés of the House—the annual as well as the session employés. I know no class of men who are harder worked than are the clerks of the Senate and House of Representatives. I know of no men who render to the Government service so difficult, so arduous, so straining upon the mind, so taxing upon the nervous system as that rendered by the intelligent corps of official reporters in this House and in the other.

I think, therefore, that if the House now intends to do an act of generosity toward any of its employés, it ought to do it in the large, liberal, broad spirit in which members have just voted to themselves compensation for traveling to and from Washington to attend upon the session of Congress. I do not speak in criticism of that action of the House, because I think that when an extra session is called the members and employés who come here in consequence of the exercise of this constitutional authority on the part of the President, are here in regular session with all the powers, duties, obligations, and emoluments belonging to a regular session.

It has not been unusual for Congress to pursue the course now proposed, and I wish to refer to some of the precedents on this subject. I do not see any reason why we should exclude from this provision the annual employés of the House any more than we should have excluded from the mileage provision just adopted the regular members of the House.

The last extra session of Congress, as I have stated, was the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 2473, gives the following account of the unanimous passage of a resolution giving the employés on the annual roll of the House one month's extra compensation for their services in the extra session:

EXTRA PAY TO HOUSE EMPLOYES.

Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration a joint resolution to pay the employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay; and I wish to say just one word in explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the employés of the House borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay at the same compensation as now paid them by law, and an amount sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi. I wish to say just one word in explanation.

Many MEMBERS. No objection; let it pass.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution (H. R. 119) was read three times and passed.

That resolution went to the Senate, and was adopted unanimously also by that body. This is all I care to say, Mr. Chairman, on the pending proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Upon examination of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas I find that it relates to different matters from those embraced in my amendment. I therefore withdraw my proposition in order that the vote may first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, after which I propose to renew my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee being withdrawn, the question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas was again read.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. HOLMAN)—ayes 139, noes 48.

So the amendment of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the following employés who were necessarily employed by the Doorkeeper during the period from November 4 to December 3, 1893, namely: Two session folders, at $69.66 each; ten laborers, at $59.79 each; one riding page, $75, and one page in the folding room, $75; in all, $887.22.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word.

My amendment, suggested a few moments ago, was to strike out this item in the bill which provides for certain employés, session employés, and that they should be paid during the recess. The amendment which I offered strikes out that section and includes all the session employés of the House, and gives them pay for November; but, inasmuch as the committee has just adopted an amendment which will pay the session employés for the month of November at least once, I will not press the amendment, but withdraw it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, because since the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas these persons to whom the committee gave a month's pay for work done will get a month's pay under that resolution. Therefore there is no need for this provision in the bill.

The motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Joel Grayson for services rendered in the document room since December 4, 1893, and to continue him in said service until and including December 31, 1894, at $75 per month, $963.59.

To pay the following employés who were necessarily employed by the Postmaster during the period from November 4 to December 3, 1893, namely: Three messengers at $114.60 each, and four messengers at $99.67 cents each; in all, $742.48.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out from the bill the paragraph beginning with line 12 down to and including line 18, for the same reason that the former paragraph was stricken out a few moments ago, these employés being provided for in the amendment adopted a short time ago.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4763, had directed him to report the same favorably to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended that it do pass.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments?

Mr. BLAND. I demand a separate vote on the extra mileage and stationery amendment.

The SPEAKER. To what amendment does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the amendment in regard to mileage.

Mr. LYNCH. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES].

The SPEAKER. That will be reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. WAUGH. I would like a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] as to the pay of special examiners.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I understand that two separate votes are demanded, then, one on the mileage and one on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. WAUGH. I withdraw that.

Mr. BLAND. A separate vote is demanded on the whole amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is also desired to have a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] providing extra pay for annual employés.

Mr. EVERETT. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the vote for the mileage and stationery were on separate amendments.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It was the same amendment, but we simply divided it.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. A separate vote will be had on the entire amendment of the gentleman from Iowa and on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. There being no other separate votes demanded, I ask a vote on the remaining amendments.

The remaining amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES].

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

On the demand for the yeas and nays there were ayes 31.

Mr. HOLMAN. The other side.

The negative vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. On the demand for the yeas and nays the ayes are 31 and the noes 183.

Mr. BLAND. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays, and pending that I move when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] demands tellers on the yeas and nays, and pending that he moves that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Thursday next.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLAND) there were—ayes 8, noes 215.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

The question being taken, there were no votes in the affirmative.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. I renew my motion that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next. That is in order, because we have voted on the other motion since.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the House that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and all other gentlemen are willing to proceed, provided they can have a yea-and-nay vote, and I think they are entitled to that. The House will save time by according them a roll call.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that we are paying $60 an hour for gas for such silliness as this.

Mr. BLAND. I have taken my stand against this, and I will not permit it to pass if I can help it, unless we can have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]?

Mr. BLAND. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I raise the point of order that that motion has just been voted upon.

Mr. HAYES. I am advised by the opponents of this measure that they will vote upon a yea-and-nay vote, so that it will not be used for the purpose of breaking a quorum. In view of that, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be taken upon this proposition.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLAND) there were—ayes 6, noes 186.

Mr. BLAND. I demand tellers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of very grave importance that we should pass this bill as early as possible, and I for one do not desire to have any Committee on Rules to bring in a motion; and I am very willing to make a proposition, if the House will agree to it. It is stated that there will be no filibustering on it hereafter, and I am willing to make a proposition that a yea-and-nay vote shall be had on this proposition.

Mr. BLAND. On this and on the bill.

Mr. REED. Regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. If the House will give me its attention for a moment I will make this proposition. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] wants a yea-and-nay vote on the mileage proposition——

A MEMBER. That has been settled by the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Then notice has been given by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he intends to move to recommit this bill, and I suppose he will want a yea-and-nay vote on that. Now that means an hour or two hours more this afternoon.

Mr. BLAND. Let us adjourn and take it up to-morrow.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That is impossible, in view of the necessities of the public service.

Mr. BLAND. This bill shall not be run through here if I can help it without the yeas and nays. You may bring in a rule and gag it through if you want to.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] if it does not require one-fifth to get the yeas and nays under the Constitution?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. Is any less number competent to obtain the yeas and nays?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I do not think less than one-fifth can force the House to that when objection is made; but this is a very important matter. I will say that the somewhat brusque manner of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] does not irritate me at all, because I know at the bottom he is brave and honest and wants to do what is right, although he may be a little scant in his manners.

Mr. BLAND. I intend to use every means in my command to defeat this bill unless I can have a yea-and-nay vote upon that proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I am perfectly willing to make any arrangement that will be satisfactory. I am willing to have a yea-and-nay vote upon the final passage of the bill and upon this proposition; but I do not wish to be confronted with filibustering on this proposition and again on the proposition to pay the clerks an extra month and again on the part of the gentleman from Indiana on his proposition. I will agree that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment and a yea-and-nay vote on the final passage of the bill; and if that is agreeable to everybody, the gentleman from Indiana as well as the gentleman from Missouri, that is the proposition I want to submit.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not important to have a yea-and-nay vote upon the final passage of the bill, but I would like to be able to ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the motion to recommit on the pension question. That only makes two.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That makes three.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I will not filibuster.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of public business and in the expedition of business and keeping open the public bureaus, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and if that be agreed to I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment and upon the final passage of the bill, the understanding being that there is to be no filibustering if that agreement is reached.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the gentleman need to ask the yeas and nays upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. There are a great many gentlemen who say they want to have the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman from Missouri stated that he desired to have the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill; and the gentleman generally knows what he wants.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the order refusing the yeas and nays be reconsidered, and that the yeas and nays be considered as ordered upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a great majority have voted against ordering the yeas and nays, and I do not suppose that the action of the majority should be overruled by the minority.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Speaker, at the request of a great many members, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York objects also. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Division.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, immediately preceding the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to adjourn he submitted a demand for tellers, but tellers did not take their places on the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had made that demand for tellers, but they had not been ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. And he had waived that by the other motions he made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws his motion, and that allows the question to recur on the demand for tellers, and the question is whether the yeas and nays shall be ordered on a vote by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri rose and said he demanded tellers, but before the Chair submitted that question there was some colloquy with a view to settlement.

Mr. BLAND. I had made the motion that the House adjourn. I withdrew this motion and the demand for tellers, in order to arrange with the gentleman from Kentucky that we reconsider the vote by which the House refused the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is in order. The question is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused the yeas and nays, and a division is demanded on that question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 154.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BLAND. I demand tellers on that.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Sixteen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. BLAND. I renew my motion that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Speaker announced that the noes had it, and the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused. I understand that proposition was agreed to. The yeas and nays are refused, tellers are refused, and the amendment is agreed to; as I understand that, the House has voted to agree to this amendment. I make that point. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question was pending on agreeing to the amendment when the majority voted in favor of it.

Mr. BLAND. The motion was simply to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused. The motion now is upon the motion to agree to the amendment. Now, I demand tellers on the motion to agree to the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to correct my statement, Mr. Speaker. I stated that the question had been put on all the propositions. The gentleman from Wisconsin demanded a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. No vote was taken. The gentleman from Wisconsin demanded the yeas and nays, so that the vote has not been taken on agreeing to the amendment. The question is now upon the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Pending that, I move that when House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Thursday next.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 2, noes 196.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; when, on a division, there were—ayes 9, noes 185.

So the House refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 180.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and two members rose in support of the demand: not a sufficient number.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House take a recess until 7 o'clock.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, and the Speaker pro tempore declared the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 204; so the motion to take a recess until 7 o'clock was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until half past 6 o'clock.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 200.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Committee on Rules, and demand the previous question upon its adoption.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the vote shall be taken on the amendments now pending to the bill H. R. 4763 and on the final passage of the said bill, and no other motion shall be entertained by the Speaker until said bill is disposed of, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it is a matter of importance——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I understand the rule to be that pending a report of the Committee on Rules one dilatory motion is in order. The gentleman has offered his resolution and demanded the previous question upon it. Now, pending that I have a right under the rule to move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. "One motion to adjourn" is the language of the rule.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have not yielded the floor, though.

Mr. BLAND. I do not understand that the rule limits the time for adjournment.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is your misfortune. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The language of the rule is "one motion to adjourn." A motion to adjourn, and a motion to adjourn to a day certain, are entirely distinct under the rules. One would require a quorum; the other would not.

Mr. BLAND. Then I can make the motion afterwards.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that it is a matter of great importance that this matter shall be speedily disposed of by the House. It is quite evident that it is not the temper of the House to have a yea-and-nay vote on these amendments. The intention of the House has been repeatedly manifested. It is also evident that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] does not intend that we shall be allowed to come to a vote except upon his own terms. Therefore it has been deemed proper to bring in this rule, so that if the House does wish to come to a vote and dispose of this bill it shall have an opportunity to do so. Having said this, I move the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, after the previous question is ordered will there not be time for debate?

The SPEAKER. There will not.

Mr. BLAND. Then do I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi has made this statement simply to cut off debate? [Laughter, and cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken on ordering the previous question, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 198, noes 16.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. SNODGRASS called for the yeas and nays on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 13, noes 198.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BLAND)—ayes 7, noes 162.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The question being taken, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BLAND)—ayes 187, noes 13.

So the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The vote will now be taken on the amendment, which has already been reported by the Clerk, but which will be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment in regard to mileage and stationery for Senators and Representatives.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BLAND. I call for a division.

The question being again taken; there were—ayes 179, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. We have been proceeding to vote under a resolution from the Committee on Rules. Before the reporting of that resolution the question just put by the Chair had already been voted upon, as it has been voted upon just now.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Wisconsin demanded the yeas and nays before any vote had been taken.

Mr. BLAND. The report of the Committee on Rules is that we proceed to vote upon these amendments. How are we to vote except under the rules of the House, which secure us the right to the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. We are to vote under the rules; but under the rules and the Constitution the yeas and nays had been refused.

Mr. BLAND. Not under the special rule under which we are now operating. The special rule reported by the Committee on Rules provides that at a certain time we shall proceed to vote on this amendment. Now, how are we to vote? If we have a right to vote by a standing vote, or by tellers, we certainly have a right to vote by yeas and nays. We are not proceeding under the regular rules of the House, but under a special rule, which orders a vote on this question, and that special rule supersedes all that has passed.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAND. It takes this matter out of the operation of the rules under which we were operating before. How can the Speaker put the question to a vote at all unless under the special rule reported by the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the House was proceeding with the consideration of the pending bill, and had agreed to all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole except two. In the progress of the consideration of these amendments the gentleman from Missouri, exercising his undoubted right under the general rules of the House, was making motions to adjourn and to fix a day to which the House should adjourn—motions which the rules recognize. The report from the Committee on Rules was not designed, as the Chair understands, to change in any way whatever the method of voting; its only purpose was to limit the motions that may be made.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BLAND. The Speaker will pardon me for saying that the report of the Committee on Rules itself provides that at a certain time a vote shall be taken on these amendments. Now, certainly a vote means a vote under the rules of the House and under the Constitution, which may be a rising vote, or a vote by tellers, or a vote by yeas and nays. This resolution reported by the Committee on Rules has displaced the prior proceeding, and we are now proceeding under a special rule reported by the Committee on Rules. If we have a right to vote upon the question at all, we certainly have a right to a constitutional vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the stage of proceeding where the yeas and nays might be demanded on this particular amendment is passed, because the gentleman from Missouri or some other gentleman asked for the yeas and nays and the House refused them, and it subsequently refused to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays had been refused. So that the question before the House prior to the report of the Committee on Rules was upon agreeing to this amendment. The status of the question was, that the yeas and nays had been demanded and refused; a motion had been made to reconsider the vote upon ordering the yeas and nays, and that had been determined in the negative; so that the pending question upon the bill was, Shall the amendment be agreed to?

But the House could not reach a vote upon that question because of intervening motions—motions to adjourn, motions for a recess, etc., which are recognized by the rules. The only purpose or scope of this report from the Committee on Rules, as the Chair understands, is that the House shall proceed under the rules, in view of what has passed, to vote without the intervention of motions which under the general rules would be permissible.

Mr. BLAND rose. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLAND. I do not wish to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I do wish to protest against bringing in a rule that cuts off debate and also the yeas and nays, forcing the House to act upon this bill under a gag law. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employés of the Senate and House, borne on the annual and session rolls on the 3d day of November, 1893, including the Capitol police and Official Reporters of the Senate and House of Representatives for extra services during the Fifty-third Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment,

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 25 voting in favor thereof.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BLAND. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to recommit the bill with the instructions which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to add the following provision to the clause in relation to the Pension Office, on page 4 of the bill:

Provided, however, That the special agents and other persons who shall be paid per diem and expenses under the foregoing appropriation of $200,000 shall be employed exclusively on the investigation of original pension claims and claims for increase of pension.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, it was rejected, there being on a division (called for by Mr. HOLMAN)—ayes 4, noes 209.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs, Shall the bill pass? on which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] demands the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays; there were—ayes 25, noes 184.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused, 17 members only voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNODGRASS. As we have been denied the right to record our votes on this bill, would it be in order for me to say that I am against it?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The yeas and nays have been refused.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 198, noes 25.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT, DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a conference report pending on an urgency deficiency bill, which it is important should be acted upon at all events not later than to-morrow. If the House prefers I will call it up now.

Several MEMBERS. Call it up.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and ask that the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, to the bill H. R. 4177, have been unable to agree on said amendment.

The committee of conference recommend that Senate amendment numbered 2, which was agreed to on a report of a former committee of conference, be stricken from the bill and omitted in the enrollment made thereof, as that provision has since been enacted on a joint resolution.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. COCKRELL,
A. P. GORMAN,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, there is one proposition involved in this report which was not strictly within the jurisdiction of the conference committee. That proposition embraces a clause which was put upon the urgent deficiency bill by the Senate, providing for the issuance of diplomas to certain exhibitors at the late World's Fair in Chicago.

At the close of the recent extraordinary session of Congress a resolution was passed by the House, and also by the Senate, and is now the law making provision for the same purpose, and inasmuch as the Senate amendment has been already agreed to by both Houses, the conference committee thought it was the proper thing to call the attention of the House to it, and ask the House to direct the enrolling clerk to leave the Senate amendment out of the bill when it finally passes both Houses.

The other proposition—that on which we have been unable to agree—refers to the amendment of the Senate which provides an appropriation for Senators' clerks during the vacation of Congress in the year 1890. The conferees on the part of the House have been unable to agree to that amendment; and we have therefore brought the bill back to the House for the purpose of taking its further sense in that regard.

Mr. COOMBS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the report.

The report of the conference committee was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I now move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. COOMBS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same, and on that I desire to be heard briefly.

Mr. SAYERS. I shall not detain the House but a few moments, Mr. Speaker. I ask that the amendment on which the conferees have been unable to agree be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, after line 12, insert:

"To pay clerks to Senators, and per diem clerks, and those retained in the service of the Senate during the recess of the Fifty-first Congress, on the resolution of the Senate of September 30, 1890, $22,088."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, that the House may thoroughly understand the proposition involved in this amendment of the Senate, I will call your attention to the fact that during the Fifty-first Congress, for the intermission between the first and second sessions of that Congress, the Senate had passed a resolution continuing the clerks of Senators from the date of adjournment of the first session to the beginning of the next session. When Congress convened in the second session of the Fifty-first Congress, and the deficiency bill went over to the Senate, the Senate placed an amendment upon the bill providing for the payment of these clerks. The conferees on the part of the House in that Congress objected, and brought the question to this body for its consideration. The House declined to recede from its position and insisted upon the objection. The Senate receded, and the bill was passed without this provision. The same thing occurred at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress and also at the second session. It has also occurred, so far as concerns the action of the House, on three occasions, I believe, two at least, during the extraordinary session of the present Congress.

In view of these circumstances, your conferees believed that it was but right that this matter should be again brought to the attention of the House for its ultimate decision.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will ask, first, whether this is to pay the Senate clerks for the month or two that there was between the first and second sessions of the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Secondly, whether since that time appropriations have not been made to make these Senate employés annual?

Mr. SAYERS. They have been.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And if this appropriation is made, or if the House recedes, it simply pays the Senate clerks for the month or two specified, and gives them for that year what they now get by appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. It does.

Mr. AITKEN. What does the committee think about receding from its opposition?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I will state to the gentleman very frankly that I am personally opposed to receding. I do not think these gentlemen ought to be paid.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is there any appropriation in this bill for the payment of members' clerks for the month of November?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; but there is for the remainder of the present session. I wish to further call the attention of the committee to this fact: that there is a provision upon this bill for the payment of members' clerks from December until the close of this session, but not for the recess.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is there any provision for the payment of members' clerks for the month of November, 1893, while the House was not in session?

Mr. SAYERS. There is no provision of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Would it be proper to insert such a provision?

Mr. SAYERS. I am opposed to such appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. My question is, whether it is possible to provide it?

Mr. McMILLIN. There is no law authorizing their employment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I am aware of that, but it is not impossible to make a law.

Mr. McMILLIN. But not on an appropriation bill, if the rules are complied with.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. From the parliamentary standpoint, I think it is fair to say to the gentleman that this is a motion to recede, and that motion is amendable. We could recede with an amendment to pay for clerical assistance in the House for the month of November, or such portion of it as the House was not in session.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think so.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no law authorizing it. I think it is clear.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] for a couple of minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I have fully sustained and supported the committee in its disagreement to this amendment of the Senate heretofore; but it is well known that this bill failed during the last session of Congress because the Senate refused to recede from this amendment. They have taken the responsibility of making this appropriation; and while I think that this House ought not to be required to endorse the action of the Senate, yet I think the House has sufficiently emphasized its position, and that we have stood out as long as we ought to; and I, for one, am in favor of agreeing to this amendment, and of letting the responsibility rest where it belongs, with the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to my colleague [Mr. HUTCHESON].

Mr. HUTCHESON. I very much wish that my colleague [Mr. SAYERS] would consent that the matter go over until to-morrow. I would not interpose any obstructive measures if there was a free, open opportunity for discussion. But I do not think that it is the proper time now to consider it. I think it is at least due to me that I should have an opportunity to present my views upon it, because of the situation in which I was placed before this honorable body in the closing hours of the last session. Unless such opportunity is given, I shall feel disposed to be obstructive this evening, and I do not desire to be.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have as much as ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HUTCHESON. The House is in no temper to hear me now, and may not be in the morning, but I think we ought to give this matter some little discussion. I think it is due to me, if anything is due to me from this House. I do not know that it is, but I would like to have an opportunity to discuss this matter in the morning, and, therefore, I hope the gentleman will consent to an adjournment. I hate to move to adjourn.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour, and the fact that a quorum is not present, I move that the House do now adjourn, with the understanding that the report will come up first thing in the morning.

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of privilege.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. WASHINGTON, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SMITH of Illinois, for this day, on account of sickness.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FINANCE REPORT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RENT OF BASEMENT OF UNION BUILDING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate by the Postmaster-General for the appropriation of $2,000 for rent of part of basement of the Union Building, on G street, in the city of Washington, used for the purpose of storing the accumulated files and papers removed on the 1st of July last from the Busch Building, on E street, to secure the safety of that building; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, a list of the judgments of the Court of Claims rendered since March, 1893; which (on motion of Mr. CHANDLER) was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of ten cigar manufacturers, citizens of Ohio, praying for the imposition of a uniform rate of duty of 35 per cent on all unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of soldiers of the late war, citizens of Morgan and Putnam Counties, Ohio, praying for an investigation of the Pension Bureau; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL presented the petition of Mrs. Eugenia R. Sweeny, of New York, widow of Gen. Thomas W. Sweeney, praying that she be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of 256 hat makers of Danbury, Conn., praying that the present duty on fur felt hats be retained; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Jane T. Smith, of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that she be granted a pension. The petition is accompanied with the affidavit of J. T. Easley, of Missouri. I move that the petition and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the memorial of William H. Lynch and 267 other citizens of Danbury, Conn., engaged in the manufacture of hats, remonstrating against certain proposed changes in the tariff on imported hats and hat material. They are workingmen, and are supposed to represent all persons engaged in this branch.

Mr. HOAR. Are they workingmen at work now?

Mr. HAWLEY. Five-sixths of them are not at work now, I am sorry to say. More than two thousand are idle. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of John Goodrow and 10 other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROPOSED DEPARTMENT OF ROADS.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of about 150,000 citizens of the United States, praying for the establishment of a department of roads as a department of executive administration of the National Government.

I desire to state that these petitioners have caused a very thorough investigation to be made, and they have ascertained that most enormous savings may be realized in the transaction of our domestic and interstate commerce, and in the transaction of almost every business by an improvement in the character of our roads, which in many parts of the country, indeed, in all parts of the country, are very far behind the roads which exist in foreign countries, especially on the continent of Europe and in England.

This matter has from a small beginning grown in the public estimation so that now this request is made by nearly 150,000, among them the best and most intelligent citizens of the country. The petition is indorsed by about a thousand newspapers. Attached to the petition are the names of seventeen governors of American States, many State officers, many judges of State courts, and, speaking now for my own State, it has the indorsement of the State Legislature and the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

I respectfully request that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which seems to me to be the most appropriate committee for its consideration, and that the petition, without the signatures, be printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, a word only supplemental to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, with the consent of the Senate.

I am somewhat familiar with the petition. Copies were scattered throughout the country for signature I think early in the last Congress. The reading of the petitions will evidence the fact that certainly from a year to a year and a half ago they were started on their mission to obtain signatures. The prayer is for the establishment of a department of roads, similar to the Department of Agriculture. I doubt very much whether the petitioners have weighed fully exactly the full import and extent of that prayer. While the subject of good roads is one that commends itself to everyone, while that cause has no greater or firmer friend than myself, I certainly would not favor the establishment of another Cabinet officer and a department akin to that of the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of taking charge of this question.

Largely because of the action and work of the newspapers in this direction there was appropriated in the last Congress, my recollection is, $10,000, for the purpose of establishing in the Department of Agriculture a bureau or division that should investigate the subject and give to the public such information concerning the practical making of roads as would be advisable. I think that perhaps answers to a very large extent the desire of these petitioners. I doubt very much whether, when they come to fully consider the matter, they would desire to go further except to maintain that bureau, which is now doing very effective work under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HOAR. The petition which has been presented asks the Senate to consider this question and to hear the views of the petitioners, and it comes from persons whose words do not fall to the ground and who are not accustomed lightly or without reflection to make such a request. I am a little surprised that my honored and intelligent friend from Nebraska takes the attitude of saying that he would never do such a thing before he has heard the petitioners; but I am inclined to think that when he has heard the petition and the petitioners he will do what takes place in other like cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single observation on this subject. While I am quite as anxious as the Senator who has presented the petition to do anything that Congress can consistently do to improve the roads of the country, I wish to call attention to the fact that the promoter of this matter, as it has come to my knowledge, is the leading manufacturer of bicycles in the United States, and I venture the suggestion that I trust if Congress does act favorably in any direction upon the question presented in the petition, the gentleman who has sent out the petitions and spent a great deal of money to produce what is now before the Senate may be influenced in some way to take into consideration the propriety of reducing the exorbitant prices that he asks for his bicycles, in the interests of the small boys of the country.

Mr. COCKRELL. The suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is exceedingly pertinent.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent, as the petition is very short, that it be either read or printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Not the names?

Mr. MANDERSON. Not the names, simply the body of the petition. It is very short. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator mean a picture of the whole thing, and the contents? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, no; the body of the petition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the petition will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. As the extraordinary course is pursued of undertaking to discuss a respectful petition before it is heard, I wish to say that I do not know who has promoted this petition or what the business is of anyone who has promoted it, but if it be true that the representative of the interests of the bicycle has an interest in it and has promoted it, I do not think that is any cause either for taunt, or for condemnation, or for sneers.

The bicycle is the poor man's chariot. Its invention and perfection within the last twenty or twenty-five years have made it possible for poor men to live at a distance from their places of work instead of living in the crowded and unhealthy parts of cities. Poor men who can not afford to keep a carriage get innocent, healthy, and harmless recreation and enjoyment, and exercise from it. It comes with very ill grace from Senators who peer out of their luxurious carriage windows drawn by elegant spans of horses to sneer at the man who finds his recreation in the bicycle.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single further observation in reply to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I think he entirely misapprehended what I said. I certainly want the boys and poor men of the country to have a better chance to use this carriage than they have at the present time. It is a fact well known to everybody who has made the slightest investigation of the matter that the bicycles which to-day are selling for $150 apiece do not cost 25 per cent of the money that is charged to the poor men the Senator alludes to who are using them. My contention is that if the prayer of this petition is to be granted some concession should be made by the chief petitioner in the direction of a proper reduction in price of the article he manufactures.

Mr. President, I know from knowledge who has promoted this scheme, and while it may be meritorious in itself I do not think that the Senator from Massachusetts ought to take offense at the suggestion I made in behalf of the poor men and poor boys of the country. I did not sneer at the matter at all. I believe in good roads as sincerely as the Senator from Massachusetts does, or as Mr. Albert A. Pope, of Boston, does, whose name appears on the petition as the promoter of this scheme. If the heading to the petition is read it will appear that I stated the exact truth when I said this matter had been promoted and a great deal of money had been spent in securing the petitions by the leading manufacturer of bicycles in the United States. That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, one word further. My honorable friend, if I mistake not, is a doctor by profession, and as he has stated, without I think knowing much about it, what is the motive of the gentleman who makes bicycles, I suppose it is equally proper for me to suggest that perhaps unconsciously to himself he may have a professional desire to have men cease to purchase the health-giving bicycle and save up their money to buy his pills. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is right in the suggestion that I at one time was a doctor. I will simply add the suggestion that if I could persuade myself that by any professional prescription I could bring the Senator from Massachusetts to permit other Senators, without unjust criticism on his part, the privileges of the Senate to the extent that he himself claims them, I should be very glad to give him a gratuitous prescription for that purpose. [Laughter.]

The petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, hereby most respectfully petition that there be founded in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, a road department, similar to the Agricultural Department, for the purpose of promoting knowledge in the art of constructing and maintaining roads; and we ask that in such department provision be made for teaching students so that they may become skilled road engineers.

In connection with this road department, we request that there be established a permanent exhibit in which shall be shown sections of roads illustrating various methods of construction and also the best road materials and machinery.

We further petition that Congress appropriate funds sufficient to erect a building at the World's Columbian Exposition for the purpose of a comprehensive road exhibit.

NOTE.—When this sheet is filled with names please attach other sheets and secure as many signatures as possible. When this is done please forward it before January 1, 1893, to the address given below. Copies of this petition have been sent to various parts of the country, and it is hoped that at least a million signatures will be secured.

All petitions sent in before January 1 will be united in one great petition, which will be presented to Congress and the result will be, no doubt, the establishment of a road department, an institute of road engineering, and a permanent road exhibit in the city of Washington, and a comprehensive exhibit of the construction and maintenance of roads at the World's Columbian Exposition.

ALBERT A. POPE.

The bill (S. 1344) to secure aërial navigation was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WHITE of California introduced a bill (S. 1345) for the relief of Dr. James L. Ord, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, at Fort Grant, Ariz.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reëxamine the following Treasury settlements heretofore certified to Congress for appropriations, and numbered 7206, 152, 175, 700, of the year 1883, and 2463, 2464, of the year 1884, amounting in all to the sum of $35,791.67; and to submit the reasons for said certification and a detailed statement of the facts upon which said claims originated.

TARIFF POLICY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution and ask that it lie on the table. I desire to give notice that at an early day after the holiday recess I shall call up the resolution for the purpose of submitting some remarks on the general subject of the tariff.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the widespread industrial depression existing in our land, bringing disaster to the manufacturing interest and loss of employment and suffering to the wage-earning classes, it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that it is unwise to attempt any change in the tariff laws now on the statute books during the present Administration, believing as we do that the announcement that the protection to American industries and American labor secured by the McKinley tariff law is to be continued will reopen the factories and workshops of the country, giving remunerative employment to the hundreds of thousands of operatives now in enforced idleness, thus doing away with the suffering and destitution which prevail to a greater extent than ever before in the history of the United States.

LAND IN PORTLAND, OREGON.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all papers and correspondence relating to the claim of the city of Portland, Oregon, for a special assessment against lots 1, 2, 7, 8 in block 172 in said city, being the block upon which the United States public building is situated, for the improvement of Morrison street, in said city, adjacent to said lots.

USE OF FORD'S THEATER BUILDING.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Ford Theater Disaster:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that the survivors of the Ford's Theater disaster are to be returned to said building for their official work: Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it would be unwise, cruel, and unsafe to ever again occupy said building with employés of the Government for clerical purposes; that in view of the dreadful disasters which have taken place within its walls, and which have filled it for all time to come with the most shocking and painful associations, said building should be used by the Government as a museum devoted to scientific purposes, or torn down and totally demolished.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of this Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up the concurrent resolution that was yesterday reported back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BRAZILIAN CABLE LINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. FRYE on the 19th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State inform the Senate whether permission has been granted to any foreign cable telegraph company to land its line on the coast of the United States since the 1st day of March, 1893; and whether permission had been refused such company prior to that date. Also, what reasons now exist for granting such permission, if it was granted, that did not pertain when it was previously refused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a local bill which will take but a moment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have a resolution coming over from yesterday called up, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill to which I refer will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business has closed, and the resolution coming over from yesterday, referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire what is the present state of the resolution to which I called attention a moment ago? The resolution was offered in the Senate in relation to the appointment of a joint committee to examine into and report upon the present condition of the maritime canal of Nicaragua, and went to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. That committee reported it back favorably. I desire to know whether I have not the right or the privilege of calling that resolution up in the morning hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the resolution to which the Senator from Alabama refers is on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. It is so marked, Mr. President, but I do not quite see why a resolution should lose its privilege of consideration because it is necessary to refer it to a committee. When the committee report comes back it seems to me that the resolution ought to occupy its place in the morning business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Being a concurrent resolution, it is the same as a bill.

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is not the same as a bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Precisely. If passed, it becomes a law.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. If it was a joint resolution, it would become a law if passed.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I will ask unanimous consent that the resolution referred to by him be laid before the Senate for consideration, to avoid any trouble.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HARRIS. Nor do I.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to exclude such matters as Senators desire to bring up. As I understand, this is a subject that will take no time. I understand the Senator to allude to the matter that was under discussion yesterday afternoon, the report of the departmental commission.

Mr. MORGAN. No: it is in relation to authorizing a committee to investigate the Nicaraguan Canal.

Mr. HOAR. That is another thing altogether.

Mr. HARRIS. I intended to add that I think the resolution of the Senator from Alabama properly goes to the Calendar, but it is subject to the request or the motion of the Senator to take it up at any time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The resolution is subject to the request of the Senator for unanimous consent for consideration, or to a motion.

Mr. HOAR. What is the purpose of the Senator about the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wanted to know if I had the privilege of having the resolution considered as morning business.

Mr. HOAR. When the resolution is considered, does the Senator desire to address the Senate upon it?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no; but I shall defer any action upon the resolution till the Senator from Massachusetts gets through with his remarks. I shall not make any motion about it now.

ALLEYS IN SQUARE 751, IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield the floor to me for about five minutes. I have a couple of bills pending here from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which have been reported unanimously, and which are matters of very great concern to the public interest here as well as to certain benevolent and private interests. I shall be glad if the Senator will give way and allow me to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for their present consideration. I do not think the consideration of the two bills will occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. If the bills do not take more than the time indicated by the Senator I shall make no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent, first, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C., be closed and the land contained therein revert to the owners of the abutting property: Provided, That any conveyance of title in this act contained shall be operative only so long as the land is used for charitable purposes.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to state for the information of the Senate that square 751 in the city of Washington is owned almost exclusively by the benevolent association known as the Society of Little Sisters of the Poor, and that no persons can be affected by the vacation of these alleys except their owners.

In addition to that, the bill has been referred to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and they have reported in favor of it. A number of property owners are also in favor of it, and no property owner in the block can be adversely affected. The committee have reported unanimously in favor of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MARTIN. The other bill for which I ask consideration is Senate bill 1267, authorizing the attorney for the District of Columbia and his assistants to administer oaths and affirmations in the discharge of their official duties. It has been examined by the committee and reported favorably unanimously; it has been referred to the district attorney, who asks that it be passed, and requests that it be done immediately, in order that he may avail himself of it at the beginning of the new year in the discharge of his official duties. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1267) authorizing the attorney for the District of Columbia and his assistants to administer oaths and affirmations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether to object to the bill or not, but if I caught the reading of it correctly it makes a very material alteration in the law in relation to perjury. The law in relation to perjury, as it has been understood in this country for many years and all the time, required that in order that a false oath should be perjury it must be confined to material matter. Immaterial matters are not considered as the basis or foundation of perjury. I discover, if I have not misunderstood the reading of the bill, that there is no qualification of that character. If the bill really does make that very material alteration in the crime of perjury it ought not to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he strike out the definition of perjury. It is very difficult to define perjury, and it ought to be done only by the Judiciary Committee, after full examination.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that he let the matter pass over for the present, and at a later hour to-day, or to-morrow morning, we may look at the question. I am not sure but that provision of the bill needs some qualification. If so, we may provide a qualification which will be satisfactory to every one.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection to the bill being passed over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: There was a bill called up and read this morning at the request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN]. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] raised the question as to whether it changed the law in respect to perjury. Since that time the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Kansas, and myself have scrutinized it, and we are all satisfied that we were mistaken. The reading of the bill at the desk made the same impression on my mind that it did on the mind of the Senator from Mississippi, but upon an examination we are satisfied that the bill is a proper one. It will not take two minutes to finish its consideration.

I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1267) authorizing the attorney for the District of Columbia and his assistants to administer oaths and affirmations.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to address the Senate very briefly at this time. I do not proposes to take up or deal with what is known as the Hawaiian question. The President's message and all previous information which has come to us on that subject have gone to the proper committee. When that committee has ascertained the facts in such a way as it shall think best, and has reported its own conclusions, we shall be ready to deal with it here. I wish to speak to a purely American question, a question affecting constitutional rights of the American people, and the constitutional power, duty, and responsibility of the various departments of the Government as established for a hundred years.

It appears that before the 4th of March, 1893, official information had come to the then Executive, which he had sent promptly and without disguise to the Senate, to the effect that in the foreign country of Hawaii there had been an attempt by the reigning Queen on her own authority to abrogate the constitution, to deprive a large number of persons who had the right of suffrage of that right, and by her own authority to declare a new constitution, new qualifications for suffrage, and new relations as to citizenship of the people dwelling in and governing that island. Her ministers protested, but in spite of their protests she went on and made her proclamation of the new constitution. Then there was a revolution. The people took up arms, as the English people took up arms against Charles I and James II, and as the American people took up arms against George III and established a new Government. Thereupon the men who had established the new Government declared that they intended to hold power until their islands could be annexed to the United States or the question of such annexation settled. The deposed Queen on her part claimed that she had yielded to a display of the force of the United States, and that she referred her rights to the justice of the United States.

It will be noticed that nobody suggested a purpose of referring that great and interesting question to Mr. Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, or to Mr. Grover Cleveland, of New York, and that nobody there suggested the purpose of referring the question to any executive officer of the United States, whether the President or the Secretary of State or the Attorney-General or the general of the Army or the admiral of the Navy, or anybody else. It was the United States to whose justice and sense of national honor and opinion as to international law this great controversy was proposed to be submitted.

Mr. President, that being the condition of things, the established Government recognized by every power on earth which had occasion to deal with it, and the deposed Government asking for a particular arbitrator on whose justice the dethroned Queen relied, to wit, the United States, there took place a certain transaction which suggests the American question, who is the United States of America; who represents in great national or international affairs its purpose, its honor, its policy as to foreign relations?

That transaction was this: The present President of the United States was inaugurated on Saturday, the 4th of March. The next day was Sunday. On Monday, the 6th of March, the names of a proposed Cabinet were sent to the Senate and were approved, and on the 7th, amid all the exciting and important questions with which an incoming Administration must deal, Hon. Mr. Blount, departed on a mission, on a secret mission, on a mission of which neither the people of the United States nor the House of Representatives of the United States nor the Senate of the United States have had any official information until Monday of the present week. His instructions followed him on the 11th, but they must have been determined on the 7th, when he took his departure; they must have been determined upon before the 7th, unless he accepted this grave and important duty on five minutes' notice, or at any rate in a single day.

So I do not think that any intelligent man can doubt that the purpose to do this thing was formed before either the President or the Secretary of State came into office, and before either of them had official access to the archives of the State Department. But that is an unimportant consideration.

Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senate to inquire as to the lawfulness of this proceeding under the American Constitution, and under the established and existing rules of international law. Mr. Blount was sent with instructions, which are familiar to us, to repair to Hawaii, and to take and report evidence as to a past transaction in its history, and as to the lawfulness of the existing and recognized government there.

Something more than that took place. He was authorized expressly to exercise, and be paramount in exercising, all the functions of the minister resident in Hawaii. He was to command the Navy, so far as any portion of it was in the port of Honolulu, and the admiral there was to obey his instructions. He was to recognize or to refuse to recognize the existing government, and was to recognize or refuse to recognize the deposed government, at his discretion. He was to have supreme and instant access to the archives. He was accredited and presented, as all foreign ministers are accredited and presented, to that government. He had a letter of credence, which he carried with him, and of which we have a copy, and the consul and the minister were alike enjoined to treat him as their official and controlling superior, and to facilitate the exercise of his paramount powers in every way they could, the minister being informed that he was not for the present to be disturbed in the exercise of his ordinary functions.

Mr. President, the question of the legality of that proceeding is a question which it is the duty of an American Senator, and of every American Senator, to understand and to deal with. But before I come to that let me add one word in regard to the other question.

This was done, as I have said, secretly; it was concealed from the people and officially concealed from us; it was done in response to an invitation addressed to the United States, that in a supreme question in which its honor, its dignity, its justice were concerned, the United States should decide. The President, when he undertook to decide that question and to withhold from the people of the United States what he was doing until it was settled one way or the other past help, seems to have supposed that he was the United States of America, and whatever that phrase meant it was but a synonym for him.

The President of the United States has three powers, with which alone we are concerned in this discussion:

First. He may appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls. This power can only be exercised by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If there be a vacancy in such an office, he may fill it during a recess of the Senate by granting a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session. That is the first power, and it is the only power existing under our form of government to appoint public ministers, of whom, by the act of Congress I cited the other day, commissioners to go abroad to foreign governments are expressly declared to be one class. It is further declared by act of Congress, in the section which enumerates envoys, ambassadors, commissioners, ministers, and consuls, that there shall be no other public ministers.

Second. The President may appoint inferior officers. But in all these cases the office must have been created, and the power of appointment vested in him by Congress.

Third. He may, to aid him in the performance and exercise of his executive powers, if convenient, appoint a mere agent as a messenger, or spy, or a person to gather or convey information. But such a person, so appointed, could be in no sense an officer of the United States, would take no oath of office, could exercise no official function, and could do no act whatever which could have any binding force on the United States, or any of the people, merely because he has done it.

Of these powers, the first two are unquestionable; and the third, I have no disposition to question now.

If the appointment of Mr. Blount falls within either of the first two classes I have enumerated, I suppose there will be no Senator so hardy as to defend his appointment. If he was appointed to exercise an inferior office, the power to fill such office has never been vested in the President. If he were a public minister his appointment was void, because the Senate was in session when it was made, and it was never consented to.

Now, it seems to my mind a proposition that never can be questioned, except under the excitement and stress of partisan emergency, that this gentleman was appointed as a public minister. He was understood by the President, who appointed him, to be a public minister. He understood himself to be a public minister. The powers with which he was clothed were, in substance, the powers of a public minister of the amplest character. He was received as a public minister by the Government to which he was accredited. No power or function of a public minister was denied him. No definition of the term public minister could be made in which he would not have been included.

That person is, as it seems to me, clearly a public officer whose acts are binding on other persons by virtue of the authority he is exercising, when such acts originate in his own discretion or judgment, and he is not merely an agent conveying the mandate of another.

Jacobs, in his law dictionary, says:

> It is the rule that where a man hath to do with another's affairs against his will and without his leave, that this is an office, and he who is in it is an officer.

In United States vs. Hartwell, 6 Wallace, 386, the question was whether the defendant, a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States, was a public officer. He was appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Justice Swayne says:

> An office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of government. The employment of the defendant was in the public service of the United States. He was appointed pursuant to law, and his compensation was fixed by law. Vacating the office of his superior would not have affected the tenure of his place. His duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional and temporary. They were to be such as his superior in office should prescribe.

In United States vs. Germaine, 99 U. S., 508, it was held that—

> Civil surgeons, appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, under section 4777 of the Revised Statutes, are not officers of the United States. They are the agents of the Commissioner, appointed by him and removable by him at his pleasure, to procure information needed to aid in the performance of his own official duties.

These cases illustrate the principle on which some of the former Administrations have proceeded in employing private agents, in a few cases, to negotiate treaties, or to learn by private inquiry the disposition of the people of foreign countries toward this Government, or to communicate to private or official persons information which may tend to influence public opinion abroad. Such persons perform no official act whatever. The President can not delegate the treaty-making power, or any part of it, and has never undertaken to do so. The officer who negotiates a treaty merely makes known to the representative of the foreign government with whom he deals what he is authorized to say the President of the United States is willing to do. But nothing of the slightest binding force has happened until the treaty is ratified by the President and until it is confirmed by the Senate.

There is one decisive test, as it seems to me, of the character which the President undertook to confer upon this agent. The public minister is not liable to be arrested or held personally responsible for acts done by his superior's order. The private citizen has no exemption from full responsibility to all the laws of the country where he happens to be. Will it be pretended that the government of Hawaii might have arrested Blount for treasonable plotting with the Queen, if he had offered to restore her, under any circumstances? They could have done it, unless he were a minister of the United States. Will it be doubted that the investigation of the circumstances which led to the establishment of an existing government, with a view to its possible overthrow, is not an act which would warrant the instant expulsion from its territory of any person engaged in it, other than the representative of a foreign government? Is there any doubt that such action, under the law of nations, would warrant the instant arrest and imprisonment of such an offender?

Now, Mr. President, these questions are not to be answered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] by reviling me; nor by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] by reviling the Puritans of New England. They are vital questions, affecting the dignity and authority of the Senate in relation to one of its most important constitutional functions, and affecting the great question of all questions, whether the people of the United States are living under a Constitution or under a dictator. They are not to be whistled down the wind. No President of the United States, in his wildest dreams, ever thought that such a power as this belonged to the Executive before the 4th of March, 1893.

But we are told that there are some precedents affecting this matter, and a list of some three hundred or four hundred cases has been produced in the Senate in which the President of the United States has appointed certain public officers, or other agents, to negotiate treaties, or, in one or two instances, to go abroad in a purely private character with a view to ascertaining from private intercourse the friendly or unfriendly disposition of the people of another country. Not one of these precedents has the slightest relation whatever to the case we are now talking about. They were collected at the time of the fishery treaty, when it was objected that the President had no authority to associate with the Secretary of State two eminent gentlemen from private life to meet the representatives of Great Britain and discuss the details of an arrangement which was first to be submitted to him, and thereafter to the Senate, and which could have no validity or binding force whatever not given to it by the official action of the Executive and the Senate.

Even in that case the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate thought the appointment unauthorized, and on an examination of the precedents it turned out that of the four hundred cases cited there were but four or five, and those were of the most insignificant character, in which the function had not been conferred on an existing diplomatic officer of the United States, or the appointment submitted to the Senate for its approval, or, if the appointment were made in vacation, the function expired before the end of the next session. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] analyzed at the time the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, which has been cited in the present discussion. I have myself gone over it again with care. I have also looked at the few additional cases produced by the Senator from Delaware. This is the result:

Of these cases, all but twelve are cases where the regular diplomatic officer of the United States, duly appointed according to law, usually the accredited minister to the country, though in a few instances the Secretary of State or his assistant, where the treaty was made in Washington, have been authorized to negotiate a treaty. It is the familiar case of a direction by the Executive to a lawful officer to perform a duty germane to his office. It is well settled that such a direction may be given. It has been held that where Congress by law imposes a new duty upon an existing officer, it is not necessary that there should be a new appointment. Our friends on the other side are driven to such desperate shifts to support this unconstitutional assumption of power by the Executive, that they gravely parade in the face of the country four hundred cases, or thereabouts, of a direction by the President to the minister representing us in a foreign country, or to the Secretary of State, as a precedent for the appointment by the President of the United States of a new diplomatic officer, without the authority of law and without the consent of the Senate, although the Senate was in session, in defiance not merely of the statute but of the Constitution itself.

There are five or six cases of barbarous or semibarbarous nations where a like commission of agency, to ransom our subjects held in bondage, and to ascertain the terms on which a treaty of peace might be made, has been committed to officers of the Navy. In one or two instances justices of the Supreme Court, with the consent of the Senate, have exercised a like function.

Five of the twelve cases cited were submitted to the Senate, and I think in one or two others the appointment was made when the Senate was not in session, and the function expired before the end of the session.

But there are five cases in all, other than those which have taken place in the present Administration, and one or two others which occurred in President Cleveland's former Administration—notably the case of Mr. Putnam and Mr. Angell, who were associated with the Secretary of State in negotiating the fishery treaty—where the names were not submitted to the Senate.

In that class of cases the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations held the proceeding invalid and unconstitutional. But in those cases, as I have said before, the person was a mere agency to communicate to the representatives of a foreign government what it was thought the President of the United States would be willing to do, and to report to our President what it was supposed the foreign government would be willing to do, nothing of an official character having happened, nothing of a binding character having happened, until the President himself had acted, and until in the case of a treaty the Senate had consented.

Now, when this officer makes his report of a treaty, signed or unsigned, no single step has been taken toward its validity.

The projected treaty must be ratified by the President, and must have the assent of the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, before it can possess any validity. When he reports it, signed or unsigned, no single step has taken place toward its validity. So the precedents which our friends on the other side clutch in their desperation have no bearing on the case, and do not in the least help President Cleveland. These five insignificant precedents, and the one or two others not so insignificant, which have occurred during the Administration of the present Executive, have not the least relation or resemblance to the present case.

The person engaged to negotiate a treaty is but a mere agent, when his powers are analyzed, to ascertain and report facts. He is clothed with no official authority. He can perform no official act. His function is the same in essence as that of the messenger who should bear dispatches, or a statistician who should collect facts. He can only converse with a like person appointed by a foreign government, make known to that person what he thinks his government will consent to, and report to his own government what he thinks the foreign government will consent to. When he has agreed upon, signed, and brought home the draft of a treaty, nothing whatever has happened except that the President of the United States has received some information for his own guidance.

Will anybody pretend that Mr. Stevens, the minister resident at Honolulu, could have been appointed to his office while the Senate was in session, or could have continued to hold it, if appointed in vacation if there had been a subsequent session of the Senate, which had ended? I do not suppose the most capacious gullet of any defender of the President would swallow such a proposition, or the most capacious stomach of any such person would digest it, unless possibly some editor of a New York newspaper, of foreign birth, not supposed to have much understanding either of the spirit or letter of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, if that be true, will anybody stand here and claim that the appointment of a person authorized to exercise every function committed to Mr. Stevens, and more—paramount to him in official authority and duty in every respect—accredited to the same government, the archives of the legation open to him, the power to command a naval vessel of the United States expressly intrusted to him and, in the language of Mr. Blount's instructions, "Your [his] authority in all matters touching the relations of this Government to the existing or other government of the islands, and the protection of our citizens therein, being [is] paramount and in him [you] alone * * * being [is] vested full discretion and power to determine when such naval forces should be landed or withdrawn," may be appointed to a new office without the advice and consent of the Senate.

Just carry this extraordinary doctrine of assumption into all other departments of executive power. May the President, who can not appoint the Director of the Mint without the consent of the Senate, send an officer to take possession of the Mint and instruct him that in all matters of its direction his authority is to be paramount, to control the coin and the coinage and the bullion there awaiting coinage? Can he put such an official, under the pretense of getting information, or with the honest purpose of getting information, into the Treasury of the United States and say, "You are to repair to the Treasury of the United States and bring information as to how that is conducted, and while you are there your power over the entire concern and function of that Department is paramount, and its whole official direction is committed to you; without a bond and without official character you are to control two or three hundred million of treasure, to sign bonds and bank notes, and issue them and receive them, and perform every official function of that great office you are to exercise"?

The President can not appoint, when the Senate is in session, a commodore of the Navy, or a major-general in the Army, without the consent and advice of the Senate. But he may, unquestionably, employ a private agent, who would not be an officer of the United States, to collect for his personal use information as to the condition of the Army. He might send such a person, in the case of a foreign war, under a flag of truce, to inquire of the general of the opposing forces upon what terms a truce or armistice or a safe conduct might be agreed upon. But will anybody pretend that because he has a right to do that, he might direct such person to take command of the Army, and say to him that his authority in all matters touching the conduct of the war should be paramount, and that in him alone should be vested full discretion and power to command, direct, and govern the Army, and determine whether the military forces of the United States should be advanced or withdrawn.

He may send a private agent of his on board a ship, or fleet, to inspect and report. He may, if he pleased, send such person on board a ship, or fleet, of another country, as a spy in time of war, or to gather information in time of peace. But I should not think the sending such spy to observe and report upon the conduct of high military and naval officers of this country should be encouraged. I do not think that if such a thing had been done by George Washington, or Andrew Jackson, or General Grant, or President Harrison, either of them would maintain the place in the respect of his country that he now holds. But there can, I suppose, be no doubt of the constitutional power. But will it be claimed that such a person might be sent on board a man-of-war, with the direction that his authority to command the ship, or govern the fleet, should be paramount; and that the commodore, though left to his ordinary duties, was only to render him such assistance as might be in his power? Can the President put such a private agent into the Mint, or into the Treasury, and subject the money or coin or bullion which is the property of the United States to his unchecked and irresponsible control?

If he can send Mr. Blount lawfully and constitutionally with the powers which are set forth in that letter of instructions (and which Mr. Gresham in alluding to them in his instructions to Mr. Willis expressly says are his official powers), he may continue him there during his entire four years in the same power. He may put a like officer in the legation to Great Britain, to France, to Germany, and every other foreign government.

Mr. President, one or the other of these alternatives may take place. If, the Senate being in session, he had a right to confer these powers upon Mr. Blount in addition to the duty of gathering information for him, the whole diplomatic service and the whole foreign policy of the United States is a question purely of executive power and the President shares it with no other department of the Government.

Mr. President, the treasure of the United States is in the keeping of the Treasurer. The precious metal, uncoined or in process of coinage, may pass into the control of the keeper of the mint. But the people of the United States would be struck with horror at an attempt to subject them to the irresponsible authority of a private agent of the Executive. But the honor, the character, and good faith, the estimation—in the eyes of foreign nations and of all the civilized world—of the United States of America, more precious than silver or gold, are committed to the keeping of its diplomatic representatives abroad. They are officials expressly enumerated in the Constitution. They are officials whose title and character are defined by the ancient legislation of the country. They carry with them the United States of America wherever they go. Their dwelling place, wherever in the civilized world they may be, is for the time being the soil of their country, and is exempted from all other jurisdiction whatever. They can be clothed with this exalted and august character, except for brief intervals, only by the authority of this body.

If we submit to this astounding and unheard-of pretension, the authority of the Senate itself, over a large part of its constitutional domain, is abandoned and gone. One of the framers of the Constitution, who had more to do than any other man with the conception and creation of the Senate, declared soon after the Constitution was adopted, that he esteemed—> the provision made for appointments to office to be a matter of very great importance, on which the liberties and safety of the people depended nearly as much as on legislation. If that was vested in the President alone he might render himself despotic. It was a saying of one of the Kings of England, "that while the King could appoint the bishops and judges, he might have what religion and laws he pleased." To give that observation its full effect, they must hold their offices—> during his pleasure; by such appointments, without control, a power might be gradually established that would be more formidable than a standing army.

If the present claim be allowed, it is of no consequence that the Constitution vests in Congress the power to make war or peace. President Cleveland may have what foreign policy he pleases, either in war or peace.

Mr. President, I repeat that the appointment of this officer under the circumstances is an attempt on the part of the Executive to bring the whole foreign diplomatic policies of the United States under his unshared control; and the question whether it shall be met, resisted, and overthrown at the threshold is a question of far more importance than whatever may happen in the interesting commonwealth of Hawaii.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who I regret not to see in his place, declared the other day that in all foreign matters he always left partisanship behind him. I have heard that Senator's speeches on the questions relating to foreign affairs. But I have never heard a like tribute to his exalted character, in that respect, from any other lips than his own. Such is my respect for that Senator, however, that I am willing to take his testimony, even in his own behalf, without other corroboration. But it occurs to me that there are some domestic questions in regard to which it might be hoped and expected a Senator of the United States might lay aside that extreme partisanship that until now had been commonly imputed to my honorable friend from Delaware. It would occur to me that in a question of Executive usurpation—a question whether the President of the United States is to take upon himself to control all the foreign policies of this country, to the exclusion of all rightful participation in that great subject—an American Senator might be expected, at least, to see that the privileges, the authority, and the dignity of the body of which he was a member are not sacrificed.

If President Cleveland could have done what he did on the 7th day of March, 1893, in the case of Hawaii, he could have continued the diplomatic agencies, so established, throughout his entire Presidential term. He could have established a like diplomatic agency and authority in every civilized country on the face of the globe. What he could do in Hawaii he could do in Great Britain. Can he at this moment send Mr. Blount to Great Britain to-morrow morning with precisely the same power that he committed to him on the 7th of March, to take possession of the archives, to be paramount in all questions touching our relations with Great Britain, and to inquire into the lawfulness of the existing government there and the disposition of the English people toward it?

Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask our nonpartisan friends on the other side if they think the President has dealt quite frankly and ingenuously with the American people or the Senate, or with either party in Hawaii. What occasion has there been for this secrecy and mystery? Mr. Blount, as I have said, left on the 7th of March and his instructions followed him four days after.

The President must have meditated and devised this attack on the Administration of his predecessor before he entered upon his office and before the archives of the Department of State had become open to his inspection. The Senate was in session more than forty days in the spring. There was abundant opportunity to lay his doubts before this body, to obtain its assent to the appointment of this foreign minister, with his extraordinary powers. Andrew Jackson declared, on one of the most important occasions in our history, whatever might be the strictness of constitutional right, that it was most becoming and proper, where it was a question of recognizing a foreign government, the consent of Congress should be obtained if it were practicable. But can any Senator give a reason, an excuse, a decent pretext for concealing these transactions till the knowledge of them was wrung from a hesitating and reluctant Executive by public indignation and the demands of both Houses of Congress? Was there any reason that the American people should not know, from March to December, what was the errand of Mr. Blount, what was his instruction, and the limitation of his authority? If Mr. Willis went out instructed to reinstate the old Government, absolutely or upon conditions, could little Hawaii help herself, if the American people had been behind the act?

No, Mr. President, this Administration has been hurried into this transaction, not by any sense of justice to Hawaii, not by any desire to vindicate the national honor, but for the sake of making what has turned out to be a weak, impotent attack on its predecessor. The great name and fame of Benjamin Harrison are a source of envy and discontent in some bosoms.

Place for a moment side by side the message by Minister Willis to Mr. Dole, and the message he was instructed, at the same time—on the same day—to convey to the Queen. The Queen, that she may be brought more easily to submit to the President's terms, is reminded that no action can be had without the consent of Congress. But no such message is sent to Dole. He is to be led to believe that the physical power of the United States is to be used for his overthrow.

Will it be claimed by the defenders of the President that when he sent Mr. Willis to Honolulu with orders to tell his great and good friend, President Dole, that the existing Government should abandon its functions and restore the Queen, and that he should go to the extent of his authority to compel compliance with that request, that he only meant to convey to President Dole an expression of his opinion in the matter, and expected Dole to understand that he neither possessed nor claimed any power in the premises? President Cleveland either intended to use the forces of our Navy for that purpose, and has abandoned the scheme because of the indignant remonstrance of the American people, or having no such power, he meant to intimidate President Dole by leading him to think that he had. Any other suggestion implies that the President of the United States, representing the dignity and authority of 65,000,000 Americans, by design and of purpose made a demand supposing that the authorities of whom he made it knew he neither had nor claimed any authority to enforce it. There is but one precedent for the instructions to Mr. Willis, if this be its explanation. I do not know whether the President had read Shakespeare, but Shakespeare—if that be true—had read the President. The instruction to Mr. Willis and the more recent attempt to keep it secret find their only parallel and example in Dogberry's instruction to the Watch:

> DOGBERRY. You are thought here to be the most senseless and fit man for the constable of the watch: therefore bear you the lantern. This is your charge: You shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man stand, in the Prince's name.
> SECOND WATCH. How if a' will not stand?
> DOGBERRY. Why, then, take no note of him, but let him go;—

[Laughter]—

> and presently call the [Cabinet] together, and thank God you are rid of a knave.
> VERGES. If he will not stand when he is bidden, he is none of the Prince's subjects.
> DOGBERRY. True, and they are to meddle with none but the Prince's subjects. * * *
> DOGBERRY. Well, masters, good night; an there be any matter of weight chances, call up me: keep your fellows' counsels and your own, and good night.

[Laughter.]

I am not at this moment dealing with the conduct of the existing Government of Hawaii, or of the men who established it. Whatever they have done they have done in the face of day as became the lineage of which they were sprung. I do not see how any man can claim that the conduct of the Queen was not an act of abdication. Her powers were derived from a written constitution. When on her own unsupported authority she undertook to overthrow that constitution and to deprive the people of Hawaii of the share in the Government which it conferred, it was an act of abdication—an act of abdication according to every historic precedent in the story of liberty. How the President tries to slur that over in his message! If anything were wanting to destroy the entire authority of that document, as a trustworthy, unbiased, and impartial narration of facts, you would need but to compare the narrative of the message with the known and undisputed actuality of the transaction. Was he dealing ingenuously with us or with the people of the United States? Was he dealing ingenuously with the Senate or the House of Representatives when he said in his message:

> On Saturday, January 14, 1893, the Queen of Hawaii, who had been contemplating the proclamation of a new constitution, had, in deference to the wishes and remonstrances of her cabinet, renounced the project for the present at least.

And when he left the narrative there he knew that the Queen had proclaimed the constitution; he knew that she had proclaimed it after the cabinet had remonstrated, after part of them had left her presence for fear of their lives if they remained to witness it; and he knew that she had given up the attempt to enforce it, only because of her fear of the popular resistance.

The President has not a word of disapprobation for the private or for the public profligacy on the part of the Queen. The passage of the shameless lottery bill, the corrupt setting on sale of her constitutional functions, the attempt to disfranchise a large class of the voters of Hawaii and to proclaim a new government in spite of the remonstrances in her cabinet, the fact that the Queen yielded not to remonstrances of the cabinet but to the rising indignation of the people, are all suppressed, as well as the implied but clear announcement of her determination to renew the attempt if a better opportunity were to come. All this is slurred over in the message which has been addressed to us; and the President only says, "The Queen of Hawaii, who had been contemplating the proclamation of a new constitution, had, in deference to the wishes and remonstrances of her cabinet, renounced the project for the present at least."

Mr. President, I say that act of the Queen, on the admitted facts, was an act of abdication as much as the abandonment of the throne by Louis Philippe or by James II. It was impossible, after such an act of abdication not provided for in the constitution, to establish a new government except as was done by the concerted action of the men of influence and character and property and intelligence who were near the seat of government. It was impossible to submit it to a popular vote. There never was a revolution on earth which was brought about by the action of the ruling power itself, followed by the establishment of a government any other way.

At the outbreak of our own Revolution the executive government of Massachusetts was vested in a committee of safety, and all the commissions to officers, civil and military, were issued for several years, I believe, in their name.

The action of the Provisional Government in Hawaii, whatever may be the fate of that commonwealth, will have an honorable place in the history of human liberty. The United States forces have been withdrawn, certainly since Mr. Blount pulled down the flag, and there is no report of a life lost, a human being injured, or a single act of disorder. The Government has been recognized by all foreign powers, and its functions have proceeded peaceably and in order. It has received with dignity the representatives of the great nations of the earth, and has sent its own to other countries.

I have heard that Mr. Thurston, the minister of the Hawaiian Republic here, is just now absent from his post. I do not know the cause of his absence and I have no official information where he has gone. I can only conjecture what may have been his last confidential conversation with Secretary Gresham. But I remember to have read somewhere of a memorable interview between John, Duke of Argyll, and Queen Caroline, shortly after the famous Porteous mob of Edinburgh. The angry Queen told the old Scotch nobleman that she would make a hunting ground of Scotland. "In that case, your majesty," said the duke, "I must go back to Inverary and get my hounds ready." I suspect Minister Thurston—from what I hear of him, and from what I hear of the men who are standing with him—may have infused a little of the same spirit into his reply to the diplomatic agent of his modern American majesty.

Mr. President, I think these questions which have nothing to do with the conduct of a past Administration, but have something to do with the pretensions of one that is present, have also a little interest for the liberty-loving, order-loving, Constitution-loving people of the United States. If they have not, if the Constitution is to be disregarded, and "an unconstitutional desire to meddle with the existing affairs of a foreign people not our own ought to regulate our conduct, I have entirely misapprehended the mission and the character of our Government and the behavior which the conscience of the people demands of our public servants."

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire whether there is any matter before the Senate at this time having reference to the affairs of Hawaii. Is there any motion now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LINDSAY in the chair). The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the message of the President of the United States transmitted in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer a resolution by way of amendment to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations shall inquire and report whether any, and, if so, what irregularities have occurred in the diplomatic or other intercourse between the United States and Hawaii in relation to the recent political revolution in Hawaii, and to this end said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths to witnesses.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to submit this resolution in connection with the motion to print.

Mr. DOLPH. Will not the investigation require the employment of a stenographer?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it will not require that.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to having the motion to refer and print go with the resolution to the committee of which the Senator from Alabama is chairman, and also I have nothing to say about the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom another message of the President on the same subject was referred, have expressed, informally of course, a desire to do their whole duty in respect of this question, and to do it impartially. With reference to the attitude of the United States Government towards Hawaii, the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and other remarks that have been made on the floor of the Senate bring up the question whether irregularities have occurred in out diplomatic and other relations with Hawaii. I think it is the duty of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of course with the consent of the Senate, to bring before the country all the evidence that bears legitimately and properly upon an inquiry of that character.

Our relations with Hawaii to-day are simply those of a republic which has recognized through its diplomatic agencies a government existing in the Hawaiian Islands, to which there appears to be no objection at all on the part of the Secretary of State or the President or any one else, but on the contrary a recognition, a firm recognition, that leaves the relations between the United States and Hawaii at this moment unaffected by what has occurred heretofore. I speak now of the relations between the two governments.

The other questions which lie behind that relate to the conduct of the two Presidents who have occupied the chief executive office in the United States in reaching the result which is now an accomplished fact, which stands before the world, to define the attitude between the United States and the Government of Hawaii. That in itself is a domestic question. It is one that now concerns us and nobody else. It is one that touches simply the matter of the regularity and propriety of the action which has occurred on the part of either or both of the Presidents of the United States in their dealing with this subject.

My purpose in bringing the matter before the Senate and getting this authority for the committee to act is to enable that committee, if it can do so, to satisfy the American mind in respect of the conduct of all its executive officers and their agents. That is the whole scope and purpose of the resolution, and I think it meets the approbation of the committee. I do not pretend to say that it has received the formal assent of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution at this time? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the same.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have read in some of the papers circulated in the Southern States statements by correspondents to the effect that it is understood here that I am opposed to the President's Hawaiian policy, and that I am one of the Senators who are expected to express their dissatisfaction with it. I wish to state that I regard the President's message as a singularly able and a very clear statement of the case, and that so far as my judgment is concerned I approve it entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the first question on referring and printing the message? That is the pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the resolution to be offered as an amendment, in the nature of instructions, to the motion to print and refer.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it is an independent resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. It can go as an independent resolution. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HOAR. I will accept it in any form that the Senator from Alabama chooses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read again.

The resolution was again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DONATION OF OBSOLETE GUN CARRIAGES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 1045) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate four obsolete gun-carriages to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 121) for the relief of William A. Starkweather, of Oregon.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to William A. Starkweather, of Oregon, $2,170, being the amount paid out by him to Owen Wade for clerk hire in the United States land office at Oregon City while register of the land office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDNANCE STORES FOR NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it now consider the bill (S. 464) for the issue of ordnance stores and supplies to the State of Nebraska to replace similar stores destroyed by fire.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEN. NAPOLEON J. T. DANA.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 104) for the relief of Gen. Napoleon J. T. Dana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Gen. Napoleon J. T. Dana, late assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, to the position of assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain of cavalry, and to place him on the retired list of the Army with that rank and pay, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said Napoleon J. T. Dana.

Mr. FRYE. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read, if there be one.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill was favorably reported at a previous Congress and passed by the Senate. The services were most meritorious.

Mr. HARRIS. We can not hear the Senator from Minnesota on this side.

Mr. FRYE. I do not care to have the report read. I understand from the Senator from Minnesota that the bill was reported favorably at a former Congress, and the report was read, and the bill passed without any objection.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill seems from the reading at the desk to increase the number of retired officers. Is that the object and purpose of it?

Mr. DAVIS. It is not the object and purpose of it, but in all these cases, except those which are peculiar in their character, where provision is made for cases of this kind, the list is necessarily increased for that purpose, and no further.

Mr. TELLER. It is increased to the amount of one.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, to the amount of one. It is done very often.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not interfere with the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT JUPITER MILITARY RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 653) to open certain parts of Fort Jupiter military reservation, in the State of Florida, to entry under the homestead laws, be taken up for present action.

The bill was read.

Mr. CALL. I should like to inquire of my colleague if adequate protection is given in the bill to persons who have gone upon the reservation and made improvements, but who are not entitled under the homestead laws, either because of having entered at some former time or for any other reason? I understand there are a large number of persons upon that reservation who have gone upon it and made valuable improvements, and that some provision for their relief should be contained in the bill.

Mr. PASCO. I will state that, in accordance with the suggestions from the General Land Office, the privilege is confined to those who are entitled to homesteads under the general homestead laws, and it is not extended beyond that.

Mr. CALL. It is my purpose to move an amendment; and it should not be done hastily, so that those persons who have gone upon the reservation and made valuable improvements there may be protected. I ask my colleague to allow the bill to go over and to add an amendment of that kind to it.

Mr. PASCO. I will state that the bill as originally framed, introduced in the last Congress by my colleague, did contain such a provision, but in accordance with the recommendation of the Interior Department that feature of the bill was stricken out and the bill presented in its present shape. If my colleague objects now to the consideration of the bill it can be passed over.

Mr. CALL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

EXTENSION OF NORTH CAPITOL STREET.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 146.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to make a statement in connection with a request to be submitted to the Senate.

House bill 4763, making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes, has been sent to the Senate and has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee have given it consideration.

It is generally quite well understood that as soon as this bill is passed, the order to adjourn for the holiday recess will be fixed for to-morrow, and will be sent to us from the other House. It is well known to most Senators that in some other legislative body, which may have to act upon this bill in the event of any amendment being made to it, it would probably be impossible to secure a quorum for the consideration of such amendment. Many Senators desire to know exactly when the time of adjournment will take place, so that they can make their arrangements accordingly.

The Committee on Appropriations have, therefore, instructed me to report the bill back without amendment, to recommend its passage, and to request the Senate to give it immediate consideration. We do this not because all the provisions of the bill are satisfactory to or are approved by the committee. There are changes which might be made, additions which might be made, and substractions which might be made, but there are appropriations in the bill which are absolutely necessary for carrying on the Public Printing Office and other branches of the public service, and great injury and loss will occur if the bill is not passed before our holiday recess, and we shall suffer the inconvenience of it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiences in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to inquire whether, during the first reading, it would be proper to offer an amendment, or to wait until the reading of the bill is completed?

Mr. HARRIS. The bill should be first read.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well, let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now being read as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. For amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be open to amendment after it shall have been read.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. PEFFER. I move to strike out all of the items referring to the mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the items which the Senator from Kansas moves to strike out.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, it is proposed to strike out from line 15 to line 19, inclusive, as follows:

For mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $130,000, for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress.

For mileage of Senators for the second session of the Fifty third Congress, $45,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress—I refer to the extraordinary session—a joint resolution was presented to this body proposing to make available the funds which had already been appropriated for the mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives for the regular session of this year.

It was my understanding then, as it is now, that the law allows to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives mileage but once a year. When the joint resolution was before the Senate at that time I objected to it on several grounds, one of which was that we were not entitled at that time to the use of funds which had been appropriated for use at another time. Another ground of objection was that we did not deserve it, that in the then condition of the country, with industries depressed, with the energies of a large portion of our people paralyzed, with thousands upon thousands of our fellow-citizens out of employment and clamoring for the bare necessities of life, that we as members of their National Legislature ought not to propose to take to ourselves money which at least doubtfully belonged to us; and now, Mr. President, I submit that the conditions are a hundredfold, yes a thousandfold worse than they were at that time.

I submit, further, that it is out of order—using the word "order" in that relation—for us to take any additional compensation, for that is what this provision means.

Our mileage is twice as much as it ought to be. The intention of the law doubtless was that actual expenses, and nothing else, should be allowed. The mileage that we are now allowed, 20 cents each way, is more than twice enough to pay all the expenses which the most fastidious person ought to incur in traveling here.

While I do not wish to detain the Senate, I do, in all candor and frankness, submit that in the face of the existing condition of affairs among the people, it is with bad grace, to say the least, that this proposition is submitted to us, and I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment striking it out.

Mr. DOLPH. This is the first time that my attention has been directed to the provision in the pending bill in regard to mileage. I wish to remind the Senator from Kansas of something which probably has escaped his attention, and that is, that no one is obliged to take the mileage. If this bill should be passed, and he or any other Senator has any compunctions of conscience about it, he can simply leave the money in the Treasury.

Mr. PEFFER. I understand very well, Mr. President, that no one is obliged to take the money. I do not wish, however, to put before the members of Congress the temptation to take it. Composed of honorable men, as this body is—I dare say I am the poorest man here—I do not like to see us going before the country at this time asking money to which the law of the land does not entitle us.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas ought to prevail. As the law now stands, we are not entitled to the proposed mileage. So the effect of this vote, if mileage is allowed, is to put into our pockets out of the public Treasury a sum which represents our mileage.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he has scrutinized the question? I have not very carefully looked at it, but my understanding of the exact state of the question now is that by a joint resolution passed during the extra session mileage was paid for that session, leaving the law as it now stands, entitling every Representative and every Senator to mileage for the regular session.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. HARRIS. If that be true, the statement with which the Senator from Mississippi starts out is an inaccuracy of statement, and I beg that he correct it if I am right about it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Tennessee is not correct about it. The resolution which was passed at the extra session, as I understood it as read from the desk, was simply to make available for that time the mileage which was due at the regular session. I hope some Senator will get the statute and see if I am correct. I know without having made any particular examination on this subject——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator shall have the benefit of the statute before we come to a vote.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I want the benefit of it and I want the country to have the benefit of it.

Mr. HARRIS. They shall have it.

Mr. GEORGE. I have never made any particular investigation into this matter. I am very apt, however, as most men are, to claim all the legal rights to which I am entitled, and I remember to have attended sessions of the Senate three times before I was entitled to mileage once. I attended the extra session of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1881. I was informed that I was not entitled to mileage, and I acquiesced. I attended the extra session of the Senate in October, 1881. I was also informed that I was not entitled to mileage then, and I acquiesced. I drew my mileage for the first time in December, 1881. So I am pretty well satisfied that the law is the way I have stated it. If I am not correct about it, I think it is due to the people of this country that the statute be produced and our right to mileage shown, for I regard this as a gratuity voted by members of Congress to themselves out of the public Treasury.

I shall read, for I have it before me now, the resolution which was passed at the extra session. I shall read it for the benefit of the Senator from Tennessee and other Senators who desire to be enlightened on this subject:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1894, approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories, for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

So it appears I was right about it. The resolution merely had the effect to anticipate, to hasten, the payment of the mileage, of what would be paid to us at this regular session.

One more remark, and then I shall take my seat. This is a gratuity which we vote to ourselves out of the public Treasury without having any lawful warrant or claim to it. I do not think that the condition of the Treasury, it being threatened with a deficit, and that the condition of the taxpayers of this country, distressed as they are, warrant us in making this gratuitous donation to ourselves.

For that reason I shall vote for the proposition to strike out so much of the bill as makes an appropriation for mileage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

Mr. GEORGE. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. What is the form of the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, striking out certain provisions of the bill relating to mileage.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the roll call proceeds—I was out for a moment—I wish to ask, has the explanation been made that the original resolution contained the language that the mileage allowed for the extra session should be in lieu of regular mileage, and that upon motion that language was stricken out by a vote of the House of Representatives? I want the Senate to understand that fact, which, if it means anything, means that it was intended to leave the statute as it stood with regard to regular mileage exactly as the statute provided.

Mr. COCKRELL. And this is only to comply with existing law.

Mr. HARRIS. Absolutely.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas proposing to strike out the provision for mileage which comes here in the bill. My colleague and myself are probably the only members of this body who have no earthly interest in the question of mileage, with the exception, probably, of the Senators from West Virginia, the Senators from Virginia, and perhaps the Senators from one or two other States.

Unquestionably the intention in framing the law in regard to mileage by a coördinate branch of the Government was to provide only for two mileages for one Congress, beginning at each regular session. It was undoubtedly framed, and as I think unjustly framed, to prohibit mileage to Senators who are called together in extra session.

I do not agree that the measure of compensation for Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, fixed, as it is, at $5,000 per annum with mileage, is a just, proper, or adequate compensation for the service rendered.

The matter of mileage operates unjustly in giving a larger compensation to some than to others who perform the same service, except in so far as the amount of travel may be greater, which is not now inconvenient to any extent. Such is the law.

It is framed in that way, and it is too late now to talk about changing it. It does not operate justly at all times upon the members of the Senate, and I am glad that the extraordinary session of Congress has brought the attention of both Houses of Congress to the fact that the law ought to be remodeled. If mileage is proper to be allowed, provision should be made hereafter to allow it for every extraordinary session, whether it embraces the Senate alone or both Houses.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is within the power of Congress to provide for it.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says, that it is in the power of Congress to make provision for it. I only desire to express my opinion about the unjust manner in which it has operated heretofore upon the members of this body, and I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will see to it hereafter that a law shall be so framed that so long as compensation is to be allowed in the shape of mileage, provision shall be made for its payment at every session of Congress which assembles, including the special sessions of the Senate.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I concur with the Senator from Maryland that this ought to be the law, but I do not think it is the law. The idea which I have about it is, that when we voted for this appropriation at the last extra session it was done in anticipation of and to make immediately available that which would belong to us at the regular session. I believe that now, and therefore I do not think that we are entitled to the sum proposed. I shall vote to sustain the motion of the Senator from Kansas. I regret that it is not the law. I believe that we should have mileage at every session as well as we should at the regular sessions, but I do not think that it is the law now, and do not propose to try to correct the evil in this way.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the general law as it appears in the Revised Statutes was perhaps wise and proper when passed to remedy what was then a possible and not infrequently an actual evil. Under the old law, as it existed prior to that time, when the President convened the Senate in extra session on the 5th day of March, when the regular session of Congress had closed on the 4th, it was within the option of every Senator to claim his mileage for that extra session, though it only involved the travel from his Washington residence to the Capitol or not, as he chose. To remedy that evil, the act was passed allowing mileage for regular sessions only; but I do not suppose that any Senator or Representative who voted for that law really intended to require a member of either House of Congress to leave his home, however remote from the capital, and travel to Washington to meet in an extra session of Congress without compensating him for the expenses and time of that trip. There is, in my judgment, nothing unreasonable, nothing unjust in that.

As to mere constructive mileage, when I am here on the 4th of March as a Senator, and I am notified to be here on the 5th or 6th or 7th, which only involves travel from my Washington residence to this Chamber, it would be an outrage for me, in my judgment, to demand or raise the question of mileage. There is no mileage in it, but if I am at my remote home and I am called to leave it at an unusual time and under unusual and extraordinary circumstances to come to the Senate Chamber, if there is reason in allowing me mileage for any trip to Washington there is as much reason for allowing it then as at any other time.

As to the resolution under which the mileage for the extra session convened by the proclamation of the President is concerned, the original draft of that resolution was that the mileage should be paid to Representatives and Senators in lieu of the mileage for the regular session, and upon motion in the House of Representatives—if I am permitted to refer to that body—a vote struck it out and allowed the mileage simply for that session, the inevitable result of which, as it seems to me, as a legal conclusion is that it leaves the general law standing, and every Representative, every Delegate, and every Senator is entitled to his mileage for the regular session.

Mr. President, I am not afraid to do justice to myself as well as to the entire constituency which I have the honor to represent on this floor. If I am called from my private engagements and my home at an unusual and extraordinary time, and have to travel from that point to this and spend whatever time may be necessary in the discharge of these public functions, if I can not justify the mileage charge, I am willing to take the consequences; I fear not the result.

I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. President, it appears to me that this proposition is quite a plain one. The resolution which was passed at the special session did not repeal any part of the statutes of the United States. It simply made available for present use an appropriation theretofore made. There has been no repeal of any law providing for the payment of mileage. The law stands and is in force, and the attempt now to overturn it by the process suggested by the Senator who has offered the amendment is, in effect, to say that, although that law is upon the statute book, although it has never been repealed, it shall be suspended for the immediate occasion. It is not proposed, as the Senator from Kansas has said, to vote money into our pockets which is not provided by law.

There is no gratuity about this provision unless Senators remain in the city of Washington or unless they travel without paying the expenses which ought to be due to the carrier transporting them. For myself, I have crossed the continent seven times since I came here last March, and I have been in the habit of paying my own fare. I have not learned how to travel without expense, nor have I as yet ascertained any mode of obtaining revenue from the United States Government with the exception of that which comes to me as my own personal salary. I see no objection whatever to taking this money as mileage which the law says belongs to us. It is provided upon the theory that we expend money in coming here and in traveling from various parts of this great country. As the law has not been repealed, and as there has been no method adopted heretofore for its abrogation, I do not propose to suspend it.

I think that the small amount of money which the bill proposes to give to a Senator is little enough under all the circumstances; but whether that be so or not, I have not fixed that law, I have had no part or parcel in arranging it. It is the law that I find here.

If there is any point in the remarks made in this Chamber in reference to the donation of money from the Treasury they apply to the antecedent joint resolution which has been passed. The money has been paid under that measure. Those remarks are not at all pertinent to the present occasion when we simply propose to take that money which is provided for us by the Federal statute.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the joint resolution passed at the extra session of Congress with reference to the payment of mileage was understood by me to be simply an anticipation of the mileage of the regular session. I believe that was generally understood to be the fact. I have been in the Senate for some seventeen years. There have been numerous extra convocations of Congress. I have known more than one attempt to collect double mileage for a session of Congress. I have never known one to be successful.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Texas allow me?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. What does he mean by "double mileage for a session of Congress"?

Mr. COKE. I mean an attempt to collect more than one mileage for the regular session; that is, an attempt to collect it for a preceding extra session.

Mr. HARRIS. Double mileage for a session of Congress is one thing and mileage for separate sessions of Congress is quite another thing. I beg to call the attention of the Senator to the distinction.

Mr. COKE. I will accept the Senator's amendment of my remark. I have never known more than one mileage to be paid during one session of Congress, and I have known repeated efforts to collect mileage on account of the meeting of an extra session of Congress. I remember two occasions at least when a bill similar to the pending proposition was before the Senate and was voted down. No Congress has ever yet passed any such bill or any such clause to a bill.

I submit that in the present condition of the country this is a bad time to start out to establish such a precedent. I shall vote against retaining the provision in the bill, because I do not believe Congress should pass it. I believe it has been generally understood that a member of Congress who comes to Washington will get mileage once, and then as many times as may be necessary for him to come in order to attend extra sessions he must come without additional mileage. That has been my understanding. That is the way the members of Congress have been treated heretofore, and I see no reason why we should make an exception in this instance.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, if I felt as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has expressed himself, that this is a gratuity we are voting to ourselves, I certainly would take the position he assumes in reference to the proposition to strike out the clauses under consideration. We have no right to give gratuities of this character. If we have the right to appropriate funds that under existing law we are fairly entitled to, the condition of the Treasury, whether it is plethoric or lean, has nothing to do with the question.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] says that in seventeen years of service here he has attended several extra sessions. In my eleven years of service here I have attended several extra sessions of the Senate, but no extra session of Congress. The last extra session of Congress that was called was in 1879, and the reason for it will probably be recollected by those who are familiar with the history of Congressional legislation about that time. The Army appropriation bill failed at the regular session, and immediately upon the expiration of the Congress, on the 4th day of March, the Executive issued a proclamation convening Congress in extraordinary session, and it met in the same same month of March. I doubt whether but few of those who lived any distance from the capital went to their homes. There was no equity in their being paid mileage for their attendance at that extra session, just as there is no equity in the proposition that when the Senate of the United States is called in extraordinary session, as it usually is after the 4th of March, at which a President is inaugurated, there should be mileage paid to the Senators of the United States who are in attendance at that session.

But the case before us is very different. Congress adjourned on the 4th day of March, and on the 7th day of August, after all had gone to their homes and were engaged, perhaps, in that private business which receives so much neglect and is so much a matter of incidental loss to the holding of a position in Congress, we were called again to come here. I submit that the equities are with us who say that for that coming and going back to our homes after Congress adjourned early in November mileage is fairly due.

I am not one of those who believe that the compensations in the way of mileage, and in the way of allowance yearly to members of Congress for stationery, postage, etc., is the best way of paying members of Congress. I think the better plan would be, if $5,000 per annum is not sufficient, to make the sum larger and cut off the $125 a year that is allowed for postage, and let members of Congress pay their postage and their stationery out of the amount that is given to them as a lump sum for their compensation.

We came here, as I said, in August, 1893, and we returned to our homes early in November. Why should we not in equity receive the compensation that is allowed by law for that going and coming? It seems to me that is very small compensation to those of us who were deprived during the last summer of the opportunity of a vacation, if we desired to spend the time in recreation, or the opportunity to attend to our private business, if necessity compelled that that should be done.

But not only is the equity with us, but the law is with the proposition that comes from the House of Representatives. It has been well construed by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], who calls attention to the language of the act, that the sum was made available to pay Senators, Members, and Delegates for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, and that was the extra session. This, on our record, on our Calendar, and on all the books at the Secretary's desk, is the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, and it is the regular session that is provided for by the law.

The First Comptroller of the Treasury is usually believed to be a pretty sound lawyer. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Bowler, who now fills that position, but I take it he is a man well fitted to decide upon questions that arise between claimants and the Government of the United States, and that he applies to statutes that are appropriating in their character that strict construction which must come to laws that regulate payments from the Government to the individual—a strict construction that favors the Government and is adverse to the individual. I find that he has written to the Sergeant-at-Arms of another body a letter dated the 28th of November, 1893, where he construes the existing law providing that mileage shall be paid for a regular session of Congress and that section of the appropriation act of last year which has been referred to. His letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 28, 1893.

SIR: I am in receipt of yours of the 27th instant, asking whether you will be authorized in paying mileage to Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, Fifty-third Congress, for their attendance at the approaching regular session without further action of Congress.

In reply thereto I would say that by section 17 of the act of July 28, 1866, which is the law governing mileage to be paid to members of Congress, they are to be allowed "20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session." As the approaching session is the regular session authorized by law, under the provisions of said section, Representatives and Delegates are entitled to receive their usual mileage.

The resolution approved August 21, 1893, making immediately available the appropriation for the payment of mileage for the fiscal year 1894 and authorizing such payment to be made for attendance upon the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, did not impliedly repeal this provision, but simply authorized the payment of mileage for attendance upon the late extraordinary session.

As no new appropriation has been made for mileage, the amount of $130,000 appropriated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1893, can not be exceeded. You will, therefore, have to govern yourself accordingly.

Respectfully yours,

R. B. BOWLER, Comptroller.

Hon. HERMAN W. SNOW,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

So we have there the decision of one of the law officers of the Government specially charged with the consideration of questions of this character, and he so construes the law. It seems to me that we can very safely stand upon his construction of it.

Mr. President, I have very little sympathy with the constant appeal that we hear to the dear people. I am one of the dear people, I hope. I believe that I feel as fully the obligation that is upon me to protect their interests as any of my associates here; but I confess I grow very tired at times of this constant threat that we shall hear from the people if we do not do so and so. I am willing to trust myself to the people. I do not believe they want a service here that is self-sacrificing. I do not believe they desire that the men whom they send to either House of Congress shall give the force of their talent and their ability and their whole strength without a fair and reasonable compensation.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, when the joint resolution passed the Senate near the close of the extra session I did not misunderstand it then nor do I misunderstand its reading now. It is clearly within the terms of the joint resolution that the appropriations made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act were to cover the mileage of Senators and Members during the fiscal year 1894; and according to the terms of the joint resolution that money, for reasons obvious to everybody, was made immediately available. As I understood the legislation at the time it was that the mileage for the regular session of 1894 was advanced for the convenience of Senators.

I do not care whether a Senator is overpaid or underpaid: that has nothing to do with the question. The question before the Senate now is, has there been since the organization of the Federal Government a mileage paid to members of this body or of the other House for an extra session of Congress? I think you will look in vain——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will cite him to a very recent precedent.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. HARRIS. At an extra session of Congress convened recently there was a joint resolution passed to pay the mileage of Members and Senators for that extra session, leaving the general law to pay for regular sessions just as it is found on the statute book.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it the particular measure that was read by the Senator from Mississippi to which the Senator from Tennessee alludes?

Mr. HARRIS. I take it for granted it is; but I beg to remind the Senator of the explanation I have already twice made on the floor that originally, when it was introduced, it contained a proviso.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the proviso, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit me to read it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Missouri will read the proviso.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is as follows:

Provided, That payments hereunder shall be in lieu of mileage authorized by law for attendance at the first regular or the next session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. On motion that proviso was stricken out, which means unmistakably that the mileage provided for by that joint resolution was for the extra session, leaving the general law standing upon the statute book just as it stood before, allowing mileage for the regular session when that session should convene.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for calling my attention to the action of the Senate with respect to the joint resolution as it was originally introduced. I was not aware of that fact. Certainly I knew of no such proceeding; and that action would probably give the Senator the right to say that the joint resolution did authorize the payment of mileage for the present session.

Mr. HARRIS. Unmistakably.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Now, let me read it as it came into the Senate as an original measure, and see what impression every Senator would gain from the joint resolution:

That the appropriation for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1894 * * * be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available.

I think few Senators understood that joint resolution to mean anything else except to advance the money due to us under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for 1894.

I want to say that I think this is a very poor time indeed for Congress to begin to appropriate money out of the public Treasury and make a new rule and precedent for their action. That consideration will control my vote.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay the Senate, but I wish to say that this is a very clear proposition to my mind. What is the provision for mileage intended for? Why is it distinct from the general compensation paid to a Senator? Evidently it is that every member of Congress shall have the means of coming to the place where the public business is to be transacted. That is the only object of it; and why compensation for this purpose should be provided at one time and not at another is a question which those who object to this provision in the bill must answer. The public money, the public business, and the interests of the people (if this Government is worth anything and those matters are to be considered) require that every member of Congress appointed to the duty of legislation shall have the means of coming here to represent the people and protect their interests, and it is just as obligatory at one time as at another that the means shall be provided by which the representatives of the people are enabled to be here. That is the object of the law. If they are required to come here ten times in a year, and there are amongst them men who are too poor to come, their expenses ought to be paid as the only way of certainly securing their presence here.

Now, in regard to this being a bad time for such an appropriation, let me say that the people of the United States who are suffering and who need relief, and great relief, and great expenditures on the part of the Government, will not be injured one penny by the appropriation. Indeed their benefit and the advancement of their interests lie in paying the expenses of Senators and Representatives in coming here and in Congress adopting broad measures for the relief of the people who are suffering now by the hundreds of thousands throughout the country.

Mr. President, I am in favor of paying mileage at every session of Congress. If that has not been the law it ought to be the law.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I find the statute which the joint resolution passed at the extraordinary session seems to amend quoted in the rules of this body, on page 287, and I read that portion which I believe pertains to the question now under consideration:

> The compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum; and, in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session: Provided, That hereafter, mileage accounts of Senators shall be certified by the President of the Senate, and those of Representatives and Delegates by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.
> Mileage for two sessions only, to be paid in the following manner, to wit: On the first day of each regular session, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for one session; and at the beginning of the second regular session of the Congress, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for such second session.

Clearly in the provisions of this statute the only mileage that members of the House or Senators are entitled to is the mileage that is to be paid at the two regular sessions of Congress provided for by the Constitution.

When the joint resolution was passed at the extraordinary session it was simply a measure anticipating the payment of the mileage which would have fallen due to Senators at this time. Under the law as it existed at that time we were not entitled to any mileage until the first regular session of Congress—that is, on the first Monday of December. Now, to anticipate the payments that would be due at this time the following joint resolution was passed:

> Resolved, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1894, approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

The statute, if it means anything, means simply that in lieu of the date of payment for the regular session, which would be this month, we permitted its payment in advance of the time fixed by general statute; and whenever we took compensation under this joint resolution passed at the extraordinary session we took the compensation that was provided for by general statute relating to the question of mileage.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his premises. I imagine that he is the only Senator on this floor who did not fully understand that the mileage which was voted the last time was not in lieu of the mileage which we were to receive at the present session. Here is the debate in the other House at the last session which was used there yesterday. Mr. HOLMAN, at the last session, offered an amendment to the joint resolution, as follows:

> Provided, That payments hereunder shall be in lieu of mileage authorized by law for attendance at the first regular or the next session of the Fifty-third Congress.

That was stricken out. Mr. O'Neill, since deceased, who was combating Mr. HOLMAN'S proviso, said what I will read:

> I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose this called session should not continue very long, as the country hopes it will not. Suppose, for instance, having acted upon the financial question, having repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman bill, and having given the banks the right to issue circulation up to the par value of their bonds; suppose we should get away by the 1st of October, does the gentleman's joint resolution propose that we shall not have mileage for coming to this extra session, to which we have been called properly by the President of the United States, and not by any act of ours?

Mr. HOLMAN replied:

> This measure does not prejudge that subject. It leaves it all open.

And the result of that debate was that they struck out the words "in lieu of mileage for the next session." We understood it in the Senate. The House debated it and passed the provision for mileage at the last session with the understanding that we were to get the mileage at this session. The Senator from Nebraska is laboring under a misapprehension as to the fact.

Mr. ALLEN. With all deference to the Senator from Idaho, I will say that I am not laboring under any misapprehension as to the language of the joint resolution making available the appropriation passed at the extra session. If the joint resolution means anything, and I take it from the language it contains, it means simply to make available the appropriation which would not have been due until this month. The language of the joint resolution is that it shall be made immediately available; that is, implying that under the general statute it would not be available until the regular session which convened the first Monday of the present month.

Under my construction of the statute we are powerless to touch any more of the money of the people without some express act appropriating it. The joint resolution makes it as express as it is possible for the English language to express a thing, that we were simply tolling the statute in advance, which would have given us compensation now instead of giving it to us in August or September. According to my view of the matter we have no right under this bill to put our hands into the pockets of the people of this country and take money from them that there is no statute in existence authorizing. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] to strike out the clauses on page 9 of the bill from line 15 to line 19, inclusive, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. If he were present I should vote nay.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. Were he present I should vote nay.

Mr. HARRIS (when his named was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I am informed by his colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] that the senior Senator from Vermont would vote "nay" if present. I record my vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], but I am advised that if present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when Mr. WALTHALL'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] has been unavoidably detained from the Senate for several days. He is paired generally with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I have had no conference with my colleague on the subject and I do not know how he would vote if he were here.

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. I am informed that if present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] on political questions. I have consulted with his colleague, and I am permitted to vote in this instance. I will let my vote stand.

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). I am reminded that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]; but I have been informed that I am at liberty to vote on this question.

The vote was recapitulated by the Secretary.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the circumstances, not knowing how the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] would vote if present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. I was requested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], who has no colleague in the Senate, to announce his pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. My colleague [Mr. SHOUP] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 41; as follows:

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARITIME CANAL OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to take up the concurrent resolution I submitted on the 18th instant, to appoint a joint committee to consider the subject of the Nicaraguan Canal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, reported yesterday from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee, to consist of three Senators (to be appointed by the President of the Senate) and three members of the House of Representatives (to be appointed by the Speaker) be raised, whose duty it shall be to examine into and report upon the present condition of the Maritime Canal of Nicaragua, now being constructed under a charter granted by the Congress of the United States and under concessions granted by the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and the prospect of the completion of said work under the control and with means to be raised by the said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, and such other matters connected with the construction and control of said canal as may better enable Congress to determine what legislation, if any, is proper and necessary for the promotion of the general welfare of the people and Government of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said committee may hold its sessions during the session of Congress at any place in the United States, and may proceed to Nicaragua and Costa Rica and there conduct the examinations required by these resolutions; and the expenses of said committee incurred on the part of the Senate shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the expenses incurred on the part of the House of Representatives shall be paid out of the contingent fund of said House.

SEC. 3. The said joint committee shall choose its chairman and appoint a clerk and stenographer and a sergeant-at-arms, who shall have, respectively, an allowance of $6 per diem while in the service of the committee. And said committee shall report upon the matters committed to them by these resolutions.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to detail one engineer officer of the Army or Navy to accompany said committee and assist in its labors.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that a resolution, whether Senate or concurrent, that makes a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate must go by law to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I will inform the Senator from Tennessee that this resolution was referred to that committee and has been unanimously reported favorably.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg pardon of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama, whether in the last clause of the resolution it would not be better to leave out the word "engineer," and to leave it in the discretion of the President to detail one or more. There are several officers in the Army and Navy who have had experience in connection with the canal, but who are not engineer officers.

Mr. MORGAN. I will move to amend the resolution in that particular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves to amend the last clause of the resolution. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 4 of the resolution, so as to read:

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is requested to detail one or more officers of the Army or Navy to attend said committee and assist in its labors.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out of the resolution the words that the committee "shall choose its chairman." I hope the Senator from Alabama will make no objection to this amendment. As I understand the proceeding in joint committees of the two Houses, each committee maintains its own authority and autonomy, and each has a chairman of its own. This would seem to proceed on the ground, if there shall be one chairman of the whole committee that it is a single body, in which perhaps four members of the House and one Sena or might vote down two Senators, or a majority of the committee of the Senate. I do not mean that any such thing will occur, but I merely make the suggestion for the purpose of having the precedents kept as I think they should be. I suppose it will make no practical difference here.

Mr. MORGAN. I was in doubt as to what the precedent is on the subject. I will modify that part of the resolution. I move to strike out the words in regard to choosing a chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, line 1, after the word "shall," strike out the words "choose its chairman and;" so as to read:

That said joint committee shall appoint a clerk and stenographer, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

ANTONIO MAXIMO MORA.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate the diplomatic correspondence since June 16, 1892, together with such views of his own as he may think proper to express, in regard to the failure of the Spanish Government to pay the indemnity agreed to be paid by that Government in the year 1886 to the United States Government for the benefit of Antonio Maximo Mora, a citizen of the United States.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the request to the President to communicate his own views is a very extraordinary provision in a resolution. I have no objection to requesting the President to communicate the facts in the case, but I object to requesting the President to communicate his own views to Congress about the matter. I suggest that that clause ought to be stricken out.

Mr. DOLPH. It is all left to the discretion of the President. I do not think there can be any objection to the resolution, but I do not care about insisting on that part of it.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator to modify it in that respect.

Mr. DOLPH. I will strike out that portion of the resolution.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if the information asked for by the resolution is not obtainable by making a request of the State Department. What is the necessity to pass resolutions day after day calling on the President for information when the fact is ascertainable at the Department?

Mr. DOLPH. All the previous correspondence has been printed and this is a request for an official document, which is accessible. There is a resolution pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations directing action by this Government to secure the collection of the claim, and action upon the resolution has been suspended on account of the correspondence between the State Department and the Spanish Government. The object of the resolution is to call for this recent correspondence in order that the committee may have the whole matter before it. I have no objection to striking out that portion of the resolution objected to by the Senator from Maryland. I will modify the resolution in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After "1892," in the third line, strike out the words "together with such views of his own as he may think proper to express;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate the diplomatic correspondence since June 16, 1892, in regard to the failure of the Spanish Government, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress from Thursday, the 21st day of December present, to Monday, the 3d day of January, 1894; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the resolution which has just been received from the House of Representatives be read at the desk for the information of the Senate. I think there is a mistake in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December present, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

Mr. HOAR. There is some mistake in the resolution. It was probably made in the engrossment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was just going to make a suggestion in regard to the matter. I ask unanimous consent to take up the resolution for consideration, and amend it by striking out "Monday" and inserting "Wednesday."

Mr. HALE. That would not change the date?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would not change the date, but simply the day. Then we can send back the resolution to the other House for concurrence in our amendment and we shall be done with it. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "Monday" and to insert "Wednesday," so as to read, "Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1894."

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

That the House recede from its disagreement to amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 10, and agree to same.

That the Senate recede from so much of amendment numbered 9 as is contained in lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, page 2, and that the House recede from its disagreement to so much of amendment numbered 9 as is contained in lines 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, page 2, and agree to same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 11, line 7, page 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, inserting after the word act a colon and the words: "Provided further, That if such company, under this authority, shall build a pier in said river outside of the pier-head lines on either side thereof, then all of the subdivisions of this act, except subdivision 'First,' shall apply to said company;" so that the whole will read as follows:

"Eighth. The right to amend, alter, modify, or repeal this act is hereby reserved, and the provisions of subdivision 3 of this act shall be extended to any other bridge company, heretofore authorized by Congress to bridge said river at New York City: Provided, That such company shall submit plans and location of its bridge, pursuant thereto, to the Secretary of War within one year after the passage of this act: Provided further, That if such company, under this authority, shall build a pier in said river outside of the pier-head lines on either side thereof, then all of the provisions of all the subdivisions of this act, except subdivision 'First,' shall apply to said company."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask to refer the bill H. R. 4863 to the Committee on Agriculture. I suppose strictly under the rule it would go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4863) to prevent the adulteration and misbranding of food and drugs, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], under clause 3 of Rule XXII, moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The Clerk will report that clause of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 3, Rule XXII:

All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may in like manner be delivered, indorsed with the names of members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred, and the titles and reference thereof, and of all bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules, shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD of the next day, and correction in case of error of reference may be made by the House, without debate, and in accordance with Rule XI, on any day immediately after the reading of the Journal, by unanimous consent, or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill read, in order that we may know the nature of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands from the gentleman from Missouri that the Committee on Agriculture claims jurisdiction of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. The Committee on Agriculture claims jurisdiction of the bill, and it had jurisdiction during the last Congress.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. WISE. I would like to state that I have no objection to the reference requested, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KILGORE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the bill just now been introduced?

The SPEAKER. The bill was introduced on yesterday and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and this morning the gentleman from Missouri, from the Committee on Agriculture, moves to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of the bill and to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the bill will be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, as it is asked. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Maine ask for its reading; and it will be read so that the House may intelligently vote on the question of reference.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TRACEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 16.

Mr. COOMBS and Mr. WARNER. No quorum.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the yeas and nays. [After a pause.] In deference to the request of the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I am willing that this matter rest just as it is, retaining its status before the House, and let the gentleman call up his conference report, rather than to consume the time now in demanding the yeas and nays and getting a quorum.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are two little matters to come up.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the question of ordering the yeas and nays upon the pending proposition will stand open until the Chair has cleared the table and the conference report has been disposed of.

Mr. DOCKERY. Another report has also to be submitted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to submit a report.

Mr. WARNER. I understand the question will stand in the present shape?

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the expenditures of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Interior Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and ordered to be printed.

FORT BRIDGER ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATION.

INCREASE OF CAPITOL POLICE FORCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent Senate resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the board of Capitol police be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint twelve additional policemen at an annual salary of $1,100 each, one-half to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the appropriations for miscellaneous items of the respective Houses, until otherwise provided for.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COBB of Missouri, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two days, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana asked leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the bill authorizing States and Territories to tax national-bank notes, greenbacks, etc.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, that bill has not been reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly I object to printing in the RECORD remarks on a bill that has not been reported.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We all object.

TARIFF.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 5,000 copies of the bill and the report thereon reported from the Committee on Ways and Means entitled "A bill to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," with an amendment. The amendment proposed by the committee is to strike out "5,000" and insert "4,000."

The committee have considered the House resolution introduced by Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, to print 5,000 copies of the bill, and the report thereon reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, entitled "A bill to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," and have directed me to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment reducing the number from 5,000 to 4,000. This amendment is made necessary for the reason that, under the law, the House can not, by a simple resolution, order printing in excess of $500.

The estimated cost of 4,000 copies is a little less than $500.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there ought to be a provision for the printing of a like number of the views of the minority.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The resolution as introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia did not call for the printing of the views of the minority. The House can not, by a single resolution, order the printing of more than 4,000 copies of the report itself and keep within the limit. If the minority wish to have 4,000 copies of their views printed that will have to be provided for by a separate resolution; and if any gentleman will introduce a resolution to print the views of the minority I undertake to say that the Committee on Printing will report it immediately.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the proper way would be to reduce the number of copies of the report to be printed by this order, and provide for an equal number of the report and of the views of the minority, so that the two might go forth together.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing, reducing the number from 5,000 to 4,000, was agreed to.

The report as amended was then adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee moved to reconsider the vote by which the report as amended was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I ask unanimous consent that a like number of copies of the views of the minority be printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection an additional order will be made that 4,000 copies of the views of the minority be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.

FURTHER URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes. Will the Chair please state how much time was consumed on the report last evening.

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes. The gentleman has fifty minutes remaining.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague, Mr. HUTCHESON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] moves that the House recede. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, after line 12, insert:

"To pay clerks to Senators, and per diem clerks, and those retained in the service of the Senate during the recess of the Fifty-first Congress, on the resolution of the Senate of September 30, 1890, $22,088."

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of this House while I seek to illustrate the old adage that a man lives to learn. When it was my pleasure to live within the ranks of the Democratic party, not participating in its leadership, I worshiped it as a child worships its mother. When I made my canvass, aspiring to the honors of this House, I looked over the field of my country and felt as Moses felt when he stood upon Mount Pisgah, that the land of Canaan was to be restored to the righteous and taken from the hand of the infidel and the robber.

During that canvass, Mr. Speaker, I gave utterance to sentiments for which I now wish to apolgize to the Republican party. I feel that it is due to both the Democratic and the Republican parties that the views which I then entertained of the two organizations should be stated here in order that my apology may be distinctly understood. I see that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] smiles. I propose hereafter to pay my compliments to his party and to show him what a change has taken place in my estimation of that party, for he stood in this House yesterday as its sole embodiment on the vote on mileage, "the boy upon the burning deck, whence all but him had fled," and yet the flames of battle did not shine upon the dead, but the bright eyes of his living companions looked into his face and smiled at his solitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, on the memorable occasion to which I have referred, I, as a Democrat, said of the Republican party what I now propose to retract and to apologize for. In what I say now I mean simply to repeat what I then said, to set down naught in malice and naught extenuate. Looking over the political field I used this language:

The Republican party is effete with plunder, drunk with power. To defeat them is to emancipate this great country from sectionalism, from oppression, from plunder, from the embers of hate, and from the passions of avarice. I believe that the Democratic party is the party of the people, seeking to elevate them, seeking to make them sovereign over all combinations and usurpations of power, seeking their greatest good; and whatever may be its faults, and however it may have blundered, its aspirations are to make this Government one of pure and simple democracy, uncorrupted by the greed of avarice, uncontaminated by the lust of power, and that when they shall come into control their chief plea, their chief boast, will be the boast of economy, and their pride will be the pride of simplicity.

Mr. Speaker, those were my honest sentiments, and I came here expecting to see them manifested by this body.

On the 3d day of November, 1893, I saw this House perpetrate what I conceived to be an outrage upon all the sentiments thus expressed. I changed my view to this extent: I said the Democratic party of the South is all a good party; the Republican party of the South and North is all a bad party; only that portion of the Democratic party which is North is corrupt; the South is pure and the Populists are spotless and immaculate.

But, Mr. Speaker, what transpired in this House yesterday has changed my sentiments again. I turn the tide of sentiment from my first view and my second view, to my third view. I stand here to-day to say that between the three parties I had rather be a Republican than a Democrat before my country on this measure, so help me God. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why do I say that?

Mr. POWERS. In behalf of the Republican party, I would remind the gentleman that "while the lamp holds out to burn" we are willing to take him in.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Yes; but your party is already overflowing with sinners.

Allow me to say that the sentiment which prevails in this House is a great astonishment to me. I say it in kindness; but when I saw the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]—honest, as every man knows him to be—stand before this House and appeal to its sentiment of right, I saw this House mock a sentiment of justice and deride a contention for economy—Democrats, Republicans, and Populists—I stood amazed. You had the right to differ with him; but the manner in which you breasted the storm and avalanche of justice showed the contempt which you had for the principles which he advocated, and announced that in your heart of hearts you do not esteem and venerate them.

The Republican party makes no pretensions to economy. [Laughter.] It stands here and confesses that it wants to rob the people; for it thereby builds up a system of protective tariff. I thank you, gentlemen [addressing the Republican side of the House], for the courage of your expression and for the maintenance of your principles. But the Democratic party says with holy, uplifted hands, "We do not intend to take a dollar from the people except it be in the administration of economic government;" yet gentlemen here pocket, and perhaps I myself will pocket, $700 in the teeth of economy. [Laughter, and cries of "Oh, no!"] Yes, gentlemen, permit me to say to you that I tried to save the Government from this extravagance; but if you undertake to deplete it, I am not going to allow you to get all that is in there. [Laughter.] I do not deny that the provision is lawful, but it is extravagant; and were I President I would speedily veto it.

Mr. Speaker, what is it that produced this sentiment in this House? I do not mean to hurt any man's sensibilities. If with unbridled lip and an uncircumcised tongue I offend, God knows, I beg pardon. In order that I might not be misconceived and might not trespass beyond the limits of propriety, I have written down deliberately what I feel on this subject, expressing my view as to how it comes about that in the great House of Commons of America the sentiment of economy is derided and the sentiment of simplicity is scorned. Let me read this to you.

What is it that has constructed this empire of opinion in this House? I can understand why the great men, the leaders of this House, should scorn economy—I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] will excuse me for alluding to him [laughter]—should not descend to economy, for great men scorn so small a thing. They hold the proud man's contumely for so contemptible a plea; they rise in their greatness and they can not descend to things so low; and conscious mediocrity (I do not think there are any such men here) likes always to stand within the shadow of greatness. That accounts for two elements of this House.

But what is it, Mr. Speaker, that makes the plain man, the common citizen who when he is in his canvass at home dresses as a plain man and talks as a plain man—what is it that has corrupted his sentiment or makes him depart from his convictions of what is modest economy and just propriety? Let me tell you. It is the great men (so-called leaders) of this House. Let me read again, so that I may give no offense.

Why, Mr. Speaker, those leaders with curled lip send through this Hall the contemptuous epithet of demagogue, and feel that they have damned the underling—Economy—and crushed its contemptible votaries by that epithet. They rain down the storm of detraction; they shoot out their darts of contumely; and with these combined arts they drive the sense and the spirit of economy from this House. No man desires to be called a demagogue; every man flinches from that epithet; and men here dare not stand up under the expression of ill-concealed contempt that is hurled at them when they dare advocate on this floor the principles of economy which they preach at home.

These men fly from and surrender their convictions rather than wear the epithet. Thus there is created a sentiment which cries shame to virtue, calls reverence mockery, friendship a sham, platform promises claptrap and false pretenses to catch votes, as the leader of Tammany proclaimed in this Hall.

Mr. MORSE. That is what some of them are.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Well, sir, I am glad the gentleman recognizes one fact which I have stated as true. I hope he will cultivate a few more of these sentiments, they will elevate him. [Laughter.]

In this way this House has become infected with the sentiment that a man who dare rise here and advocate economy is an infernal demagogue, a false pretender, a mean, low, base hypocrite, who dare not face this great and grand House with his base pretensions.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, the force of the sentiment created by that epithet hurled into this House. I know its power. It is the Krupp gun, the dynamite shell that drives the timid and fearful from the field disconcerted. But let its thunders roar and let its lightnings descend athwart this House: I pray God that some may stand undismayed until wrong gives way to right and justice sits enthroned where now sits Plunder's god and Craft's despoiler. [Applause.] I pray God that economy may again be restored as it existed in the days of Thomas Jefferson, when plain men were the nation's lords. [Applause.]

If, Mr. Speaker, to believe that economy is right and that extravagance is plunder, that modest simplicity is grander and more glorious than gaudy plunder, constitute a man a demagogue, then I hail the epithet as a proud distinction and will wear its colors as a badge of honor. [Loud applause.]

So much, then, for the sentiment. Let us come now to the work that is before us, and let me once more renew my appeal to this House for a return to economy, especially in this particular instance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that his time be continued.

Mr. SAYERS. I have control of the time, and will yield my colleague five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended. Is there objection?

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield ten minutes more to my colleague, as he desires the time.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I had to make this apology, because I feel ashamed to come before this House advocating economy which this House so condemns. I never like to feel that I am in contempt, and I wish to state why, with the simplicity of my original feelings, I came here with some expectation that there might be such a thing as economy practiced in this Government. But it seems to me that that is impossible. The precedents are all against me, and those feelings are gone now like a schoolboy's tale, or like the fleeting shadow of a dream. I only want it understood, before I part from the question, that I have still hopes that the traditions and views of the Democratic party will bring us back to a recognition of the fact that this should be an economic government, administered for the people.

The Republican party has departed so long and so far from that principle that, like Macbeth, they have stepped so far from the shore that it is easier to keep on than to turn back. I do not give the exact language. I scorn literal quotations [laughter]; but they will never return to the shore. The Populist party I had hoped would stand with us, but only one stood by us on yesterday. I have hopes still of the Democratic party, the silver wing of the Democratic party, because of the 48 votes yesterday against that measure I believe 47 were silver-wing Democrats, and let us hope that they will inspire the House with a better sentiment by the spotless purity of their white wings.

I am glad to say that with the 47 stood most of my colleagues from Texas. These constitute the leaven that will leaven the whole lump, and yet save this country from absolute destruction and the Treasury from being absolutely looted.

Now, I pass to the question before the House. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this measure ought to pass, for a number of reasons.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HUTCHESON. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. The gentleman stated that there was but one Populist who voted against this yesterday. I do not know how many did, but I know that I did, and I know of two others.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I am glad to accept the correction. I would not misrepresent the gentleman for the world. I understand there were two others, two more converts to righteousness, Mr. Speaker, and I want them to go upon record; but as a party they blasted my hopes and disappointed my expectations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give the reasons why I do not believe this bill ought to pass: First and foremost, the conditions have changed since this measure came to this House. You bestowed upon the Senators of this country yesterday a bounty that they did not know of. I came down with one of them this morning, and he was surprised to know that you had given him mileage. For God's sake, give him an opportunity of saying that he would have paid his clerk out of that mileage if he had known he was going to get it. Let him understand that new legislation has been enacted, and that, if he was not personally able to pay his clerk yesterday, this House has given him a fund out of the Treasury wherewith he can do it; and he may do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. And more than enough.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Yes, more. I will give another reason, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make a final appeal to a sentiment which I trust this House has not lost. If it has lost the sentiment of economy, I trust it has not lost the sentiment of self-respect. Let me appeal for a moment to that sentiment and see if it, too, has taken the wings of the morning and flown to the uttermost part of the earth. If this measure ought to be passed at all, it ought not to be passed as it is now presented. It is an insult upon this House to insist upon it in this form.

And here permit me to answer a statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] yesterday. He said that the House had rebuked this measure and had performed its duty, and now could afford to pass it. The light of history contradicts him. The House got down upon its knees and stood ready to deliver this thing on the 3d of November, 1893, and would have delivered it, and they have encouraged the Senate by their position then, ready to deliver what was sought, by this same process, which was defeated only by filibustering; and the attitude of the House then has provoked this new assault.

Mr. HOLMAN. What gentleman from Indiana does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HUTCHESON. I mean the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BYNUM. I beg the gentleman's pardon for mentioning his name.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman will agree that the House, before that, had refused to concur.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Yes, but the House since then had withdrawn its refusal, and indicated to the Senate that it stood ready to concur in the proposition.

Mr. BYNUM. After the Senate had refused to recede.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Yes; but, Mr. Speaker, I differ with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] in that respect. It is not the object of a legislator simply to make a record. It ought to be his object not only to make a record, but to defeat vicious legislation, record or no record. If we mean to pass this measure, let us send a prviate messenger to the Senate and tell the Senate that we intend to pass it as a separate and independent bill; that we do not need to be knocked down and dragged out to do it. Let them save themselves and save us from the discredit of dragging this measure through upon this bill.

[Here the time expired.]

Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the House for having trespassed on its time. I trust that the right will still prevail.

Mr. HAYES. It will.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Such methods, Mr. Speaker, have looted our Treasury, driven our people from affluence to indigence, from indigence to famine, and their audacity has grown with their impunity. But the time will come. I trust in God, when the people will come to gather their own. The vacant throne of justice will once again be claimed by the rightful heir, and that democracy which scorns the trappings of display and splendor will be the restored priestess to a desecrated and dismantled altar.

CORRECTION.

During the delivery of Mr. HUTCHESON'S remarks the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to ask a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] has asked unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes longer.

Mr. BLAIR. I object, with this reservation: I have been all the morning endeavoring to get the floor to ask a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That could not be done pending the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought I might ask unanimous consent to make the correction at this time as a matter of great personal convenience to myself, and then withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had known the purpose of the gentleman he would have recognized him earlier in the day.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I would like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield to the gentleman ten minutes more time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New Hampshire will submit a correction of the RECORD at this time.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday morning it may be remembered at the close of the remarks on the Hawaiian business I offered a resolution expressing the sense of the House in favor of the annexation of the islands to the United States. Unfortunately the House objected to it, owing to some misapprehension I must believe. [Laughter.] Now, by some means, perhaps in the paralysis caused by the general disappointment that the resolution was not at once considered, the clerks have failed to make a note of the fact that the House referred the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. The fact is not stated in the Journal. I ask that the correction be made so as to show the proper reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was referred as indicated by the gentleman, and the correction will be made in accordance with his suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that we must have those islands and they must have us, and we may as well go about the matter considerately.

Mr. HUTCHESON then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS].

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I shall probably not take ten minutes. I shall not attempt to controvert the ideas of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] in relation to economy. I think that in the business before us the House has certainly vindicated its ideas of economy in this special matter. It relates to an expenditure authorized and made by the Senate. It was attached to a deficiency bill, and has been before the House certainly three times during the Fifty-third Congress; and, as I understand, three or four times in previous Congresses. By our disagreement we have relieved ourselves of responsibility, if any existed. We must admit, Mr. Speaker, that each House must be the judge of the morality, honesty, and wisdom of its own expenditures. It is true that each House passes upon the expenditures of the other, and that practice serves as a sort of a drag upon our expenditures; but having made our criticism, as we have in this case five or six times, we must retire from it if we would preserve the cordiality which should exist between the two branches of the legislative department of the Government.

If the Senate made a similar demand upon us we would not permit them to override us; and I can not possibly conceive of the dignified body at the other end of the Capitol retiring from its position. I am sure that if I were a member of that body I would not do so. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without any criticism of, or without any attempted justification of the expenditure, but simply on the question of policy and practice, I persist in my motion that we recede from our disagreement.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question upon the two motions.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS], that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the Chair was in doubt.

Mr. SAYERS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 42.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there—were yeas 141, nays 90, not voting 122; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The yeas have it, and the House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agrees to the same.

On motion of Mr. COOMBS, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. There is no other question at issue on the report. That disposes of the report. The bill will be disposed of on notification being given to the Senate that the House has receded from its disagreement.

RELIEF OF EMPLOYÉS OF RECORD AND PENSION DIVISION, WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McMILLIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. What becomes of the vote that was to be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to refer a bill to his committee. That was to come up immediately after the conference report was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, several members have asked me to withdraw my motion for the day, that they may have a chance to read the bill, which has just been printed, and has been brought to the House this morning. Without objection, I will withdraw it for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the motion made to correct a reference this morning, and it will be submitted at a later day.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That those employés of the Record and Pension Office of the War Department who were injured by the falling of the floors in the Ford's Theater building on the 9th day of June, 1893, be, and they are hereby, exempted from the operation of so much of the act approved March 3, 1893, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, as limits the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments; and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said employés such portions of their salaries as have been withheld because of absence on account of injuries received in the Ford's Theater disaster.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "exempted," in line 7, insert the following words "during the fiscal year 1894, in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask consent that this joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the existing law governing leaves of absence is found in the provisos to section 5 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year, and is as follows:

SEC. 5. That on and after July 1, 1893, it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments, in the interest of the public service, to require of all clerks and other employés, of whatever grade or class, in their respective Departments, not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the heads of the Department may, by special order, stating the reason, further extend or limit the hours of service of any clerk or employé in their Departments, respectively; but in case of an extension it shall be without additional compensation: And provided further, That the head of any Department may grant thirty days' annual and thirty days' sick leave, with pay, in any one year to each clerk or employé, the sick leave to be allowed in cases of personal illness only, or where some member of the immediate family is afflicted with a contagious disease and requires the care and attendance of such employé, or where his or her presence in the Department would jeopardize the health of fellow-clerks: And be it further provided, That in exceptional and meritorious cases, where to limit such sick leave would work peculiar hardship, it may be extended, in the discretion of the head of the Department, with pay, not exceeding sixty days in any one case or in any one calendar year.

The first clause of the pending bill suspends the law in reference to leaves of absence in so far as it relates to employés injured at the accident in Ford's Theater on the 9th of June last. The second clause of the bill provides for the payment of the salaries that have been withheld. Eighty persons were injured by that accident, in addition to the twenty-two who were killed. Of the eighty persons injured, seventy-six returned to duty on the 16th of October last. Four have not yet returned, and of that four two are seriously injured. The amount carried by the bill on account of the salaries of the seventy-six employés who returned to duty on the 16th of October last aggregates $2,044.88.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations limits the leave of absence to the present fiscal year in the discretion of the Secretary of War; so that it is estimated the entire liability involved by the provisions of the bill will not exceed $3,500. I may state also in this connection that in addition to the merits of this case, not now necessary to recite, there are several precedents for the proposed action on the part of Congress. I will cite one. On the 19th day of July, 1876, Congress passed an act for the relief of one employé of the Senate who was injured in an accident in this building, and for the relief of the family of another who was killed in the same accident. That act is found on page 455 of volume 19 of the Statutes at Large, and is as follows:

CHAPTER 215.—An act for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler.

Whereas John T. King, lately employed as a carpenter and cabinet-maker about the Capitol, while in the discharge of his duties, was killed by an explosion of gas in the closet under the eastern stairway of the Senate, leaving a wife, three children, two grandchildren, and a mother-in-law without any means of support; and,

Whereas L. B. Cutler, principal assistant in the folding room of the Senate, was so injured at the same time and under the same circumstances as to be disabled for life, leaving a wife without means of support and a mother to whose support he has partly contributed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $3,000 for the aid and support of the family of the late John T. King, and the further sum of $3,000 for the aid and support of L. B. Cutler, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the above-mentioned purposes, who may, at his discretion, pay the same to the respective parties in annual installments, or all in one payment, or invest the same for their use and benefit, as he may think most expedient.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether any provision is made in this bill for the families of those who were killed in the disaster at Ford's Theater?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; this bill simply deals with the question of sick leave and of salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. The other question is intended to be postponed for the present?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it will be considered hereafter?

Mr. DOCKERY. That question will come up for consideration later.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the committee have had before them at all the question of provision for the families of the killed?

Mr. DOCKERY. That question has not been presented to the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. Has the question been considered of the War Department sending those clerks back to that building?

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill does not deal with that question. The gentleman will remember that at the beginning of the extraordinary session $6,000 was appropriated by an urgent deficiency bill to repair the Ford's Theater building, and providing, according to my recollection, that it should be occupied only when the Architect of the Capitol should have certified that it was absolutely safe. But, as I have said, the question of the occupancy of the building is not raised by any provision of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. It may be proper to add, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has stated, that the maximum carried by this bill will be only somewhat over $3,000, that that statement is made on the assumption that the Secretary of War, in his discretion, will extend the privileges of this bill only to those who have not yet returned to duty. If any of the seventy-six should, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be given any leave of absence under the provisions of this bill, the amount will be increased.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am glad that the gentleman from Maine has called attention to that point, as his statement supplements my own and makes the case complete. In my statement a moment ago I contemplated that the Secretary of War, in the exercise of his discretion, would grant this additional leave only to the four persons who are still absent from their desks.

Mr. DINGLEY. Only two of those four are understood to be seriously injured.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. Only two of the four are thought to be injured. Mr. Speaker, I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered. The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee was not ordered printed and I ask that that order be made, inasmuch as the report contains the testimony of the chief of the Record and Pension Division, upon which this bill was favorably reported.

The SPEAKER. The report will be ordered printed in the usual form.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON AT NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. GEARY submitted a conference report, which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3289) "to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 10, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from so much of amendment numbered 9 as is contained in lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, page 2, and that the House recede from its disagreement to so much of amendment numbered 9 as is contained in lines 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, page 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 11, line 7, page 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, inserting after the word "act" a colon and the words: "Provided further, That if such company, under this authority, shall build a pier in said river outside of the pier-head lines on either side thereof, then all of the subdivisions of this act except subdivision 'First,' shall apply to said company;" so that the whole will read as follows:

"Eighth. The right to amend, alter, modify, or repeal this act is hereby reserved, and the provisions of subdivision 3 of this act shall be extended to any other bridge company heretofore authorized by Congress to bridge said river at New York City: Provided, That such company shall submit plans and location of its bridge, pursuant thereto, to the Secretary of War within one year after the passage of this act: Provided further, That if such company, under this authority, shall build a pier in said river outside of the pier-head lines on either side thereof, then all of the provisions of all the subdivisions of this act, except subdivision 'First,' shall apply to said company."

T. J. GEARY,
L. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. P. GORMAN,
G. G. VEST,
WM. P. FRYE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 10 are clerical changes substantially and make more definite and certain the language of the House bill.

Amendment numbered 9 of the Senate struck out of the House bill the provision giving to the city authorities of New York the right to locate the approaches of said bridge in the city of New York. From this amendment the Senate conferees receded, and the bill as now reported contains the substance of the provision as it passed the House.

Amendment numbered 11 provides that the rights conferred on the bridge company herein named shall be available to the other bridge company heretofore chartered, and if it avails itself of such provisions it shall also adopt and become subject to all the provisions of this bill.

Very respectfully,

T. J. GEARY,
L. FLETCHER,
House Conferees.

Mr. GEARY. I move that the House agree to this report. As this question is to give rise to some discussion, I suggest that debate be limited. I understand that an hour and a half, to be divided equally between the friends and opponents of the measure, will be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this is not a unanimous report of the conferees, and that it has been agreed between the members concurring in the report and those dissenting that the debate shall proceed for an hour and a half, the time to be equally divided, one-half under the control of the gentleman from from California [Mr. GEARY] in favor of the report, and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] in opposition. If there be no objection, that agreement will be regarded as approved by the House. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEARY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEARY. We reserve our time.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the bill now before the House.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman kindly inform us whether the bill as now reported will allow the free navigation of the river?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the very point; it does not. I shall endeavor to set forth the objections to the bill in a brief, concise manner——

Mr. HICKS. I am opposed to the bill unless it preserves the freedom of navigation.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the first place, I oppose this bill because into this charter of the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company there have been interpolated by the Senate new privileges to the earlier company—the North River Bridge Company.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that this matter is more than a "twice-told tale" to members of this House. I am aware that this charter and its merits have been told a thousand times in the corridors and the lobbies and other places in the city of Washington; and it is not unnatural that gentlemen of this House should feel at first some degree of impatience at a new discussion of the merits of the bill. But I ask you, one and all, on both sides of the House, to give me your attention for fifteen or twenty minutes in order that I may state clearly, plainly, concisely, certain reasons why this bill should not be allowed to become a law and why it is incumbent on every one of you who favor honest government and the freedom of navigation and the interests of commerce to vote against this charter.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an exceedingly important matter; and we desire to hear the gentleman from New York. I ask that there be better order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, so that the gentleman from New York may be heard.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman from Maine for his kindly interposition, because I think it will aid me in showing clearly to the House that this bill should not pass.

I am aware that in urging my views now I may seem to be coming forward at a late hour; but however late the hour, when the interests of good government and of honesty are involved, the moment is never too late.

Now, gentlemen, what is the question before this House? And I wish to draw attention to my first point—that the bill which you are asked now hurriedly to pass without consideration, without adequate debate, at the behest of men who throng the corridors about this Chamber, is radically different from the bill which was passed by this House some weeks ago. This is a bill which changes essentially in two important features the charter which this Congress granted on the 11th day of July, 1890, to the North River Bridge Company. That charter was granted on two conditions: One was that a single span should cross and span the entire river; the other that the mails of the United States should be transported free of toll.

Now, without notice in the title of this bill, with a title saying that it is a charter for the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company, we have a provision interpolated which changes a former charter to another corporation and takes away from the Government the right to the free transmission of its mails. Do we gain such privileges to throw them away lightly just because a compromise has been effected between contending corporations? New York stands there with her vesture and her raiment rent in twain by the contending suitors, while she is left bare and exposed to the cold.

Gentlemen, these are the two salient amendments; and by virtue of these two amendments this bill should never be passed. You have no right when you grant a charter to any corporation on consideration that there shall be no pier or tower of stone in the river at Twenty-third street, Tenth street, or lower down in the harbor of New York, to come here just before the Christmas holidays with a proposition that undertakes to wipe away every safeguard that has been established. You have no right to obstruct and despoil the greatest harbor of the United States and the third greatest commercial port in the world.

I know that you gentlemen have no direct responsibility, no responsibility which will come home to you from your constituents in this regard, for you live far away from these great navigable waters which flow around our island home. But I think there is one responsibility which rests upon Democrats and Republicans alike: you have the responsibility to cast your vote against any charter or license about which there may be the slightest atmosphere of doubt. There is in the constitution of the State of New York a salutary provision that when, in the title of a local act, the subject-matter be not embraced, the act is unconstitutional; and I think it would be a wholesome rule if applied to measures passed by the Federal Legislature, for it would have the effect of sounding a note of warning to tell men to be on the lookout for such measures; for if we had not been active and vigilant to-day this amendment referring to this bridge charter would have slipped through the House without comment or protest. It may be that, divided as the New York delegation is divided on this question, our protest will be unavailing——

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, he will recollect that the Federal Constitution has no provision regarding a disclosure in the title of a bill of the contents.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all. I understand that. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, I wish to say that my statement was that the Federal Constitution differed in that respect from the constitution of the State of New York, but I thought it would be a good and salutary provision to have incorporated in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. OATES. There is such a provision in the constitution of my State, though it is not in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It is in the constitutions of all the States.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is in the constitution of the State of New York, and I happen to have some familiarity with that constitution as well as with the Federal Constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up in the Senate originally and on Mr. MCPHERSON'S amendment, he, representing the great State of New Jersey, objected to any provision in the bill which would allow a pier or a tower to be erected in the river. He protested against any such provision, and when the bill passed the Senate it was passed by only 27 votes, there being 17 against it and 41 not voting at all. In the debate in the Senate Chamber on the 31st of October, 1893, on this bill it is apparent that there was a misunderstanding as to the true conception, object, and scope of the bill. Senator GRAY of Delaware asked the Senator from Missouri this question. He said:

> If I understand the Senator from Missouri, this bill is not a bill which attempts to charter a bridge company, but it is merely to remove any objection which the United States may have to the erection of a bridge by a corporation already authorized by the States of New Jersey and New York to make that construction.

That was a misconception of the law on the subject. Over the great navigable waters, the public rivers flowing into the sea, the paramount control of the bridging of such streams and the granting of charters for such purposes is a matter of authority in Congress, and, as the Supreme Court of the United States said in the case of The Bridge Company vs. United States, when Congress steps in her action is supreme and overrides all that the State may do. So I say upon you rests the responsibility for this legislation if it be wrong. You can not throw it upon the States. It is with Congress and upon Congress that the responsibility of this law must lie to-day and must lie forever.

It is true that when we have under consideration the bridging of the North River, flowing between different States, or have the bridging of the East River, flowing between the adjacent shores of the same State, being both great navigable arteries flowing out as the channels of commerce to the ocean and the sea, the concurrent legislation of the State and the United States is needed for the permission to bridge. The authority of the State is needed by virtue of its ownership and authority over the land under water, and the land on the shore, and its qualified sovereignty in the stream.

The authority of the Federal Legislature is necessary to act concurrently with the State by virtue of its power to regulate commerce, and when the Federal Legislature does act the act of the State Legislature becomes of lesser consequence: and I say in cases of this kind, where concurrent legislation is necessary, we should have some regard and some respect for the voice of the State Legislature. We should have some respect for the sovereign will of the people of the State of New York: and I call your attention to the fact that both the preamble and introductory section of this law are misleading, because they allege incorporation by the States of New Jersey and New York, whereas, as a matter of fact, the charter granted by the State of New Jersey lapsed twenty years ago. It became null and void in 1873, and it has never come into life or being since.

The charter from the State of New York, which was passed in 1890, was granted on one express condition, and that condition was that the bridge should span the whole waterway, and that there should be no pier or tower of stone in the river. Is it acting in good faith for the promoters of this scheme to come here asking a measure of legislation from us which violates the condition upon which they obtained their charter from the State of New York? Is that good faith? Is that common honesty? I say no, gentlemen, and I say anyone who seek such legislation should be regarded with suspicion.

Let me say one word about a single span. A single span covering the entire waterway is feasible and practicable. I will not enumerate now the names of the engineers who say so, but I will cite in support of my conclusion one document from the chief engineer of this very bridge corporation. I will read you a few words written by Mr. Thomas C. Clarke, the chief engineer of the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company, on the 15th day of March, 1892, when he announced that although he believed a pier in the river would be no obstruction, there was a great feeling in the States of New York and New Jersey against the pier, and he did not believe, for one, that the Board of Engineers would ever permit a pier to be placed in the river; and then he goes on to say:

> I am prepared to say that if they decide that there shall be no pier in the the river, I can build you a bridge on the combined suspension-cantilever plan that shall be strong enough and stiff enough to carry trains at 20 miles an hour, and at a cost that shall not be prohibitory.

Out of the mouth of their own witness comes conviction, and I claim that they are bound by this statement of Mr. Clarke, which was transmitted to the Senate of the United States by Mr. Andrew H. Green in 1892.

Now, whether a bridge without a pier be practicable at a very low cost or not, we will not discuss. I concede that it will cost more money. I concede that it may cost some millions more. I do not believe that it will cost any such sum as that stated by the promoters. But whatever it costs, I say that you have no right to destroy the harbor of New York by placing an obstruction which may and probably would exist for all time, and with each successive year be a further and growing impediment to navigation.

I know something about this water front. I represent the district covering the whole coast line of Staten Island and the water front running from Peck's Slip around the Battery up the North River to West Houston street. I represent the bodies interested in this great question of transportation and commerce. I am supported in this protest by the Chamber of Commerce, by the Maritime Association, by the canal committee of the Produce Exchange, and by every one interested in the great transshipment of freight by canal boats and tows in the harbor of New York. To be brief, I will state two objections: The first is that this pier must be some 250 or 300 feet square. That of itself will be a serious objection to the craft plying up and down the river and across the river, for you must remember that in the harbor of New York we have river navigation up and down, and harbor navigation across and diagonally.

All those interests will be dangerously affected, and in addition to that, as Senator GRAY pointed out in the Senate, the flow of the stream will be greatly impeded. The water flowing up and down will be injuriously affected, and gradually there will form an island there, an accretion of mud and sand and various kinds of deposit, so that the usefulness of the harbor will be seriously interfered with at the point where the bridge is located.

Now, what did Senator GRAY say? He said that he trusted that safeguards would be introduced, so that the Secretary of War would have power to take care of these obstructions. But, gentlemen, the trouble is, according to the decisions of the United States courts, that when an obstruction has once been authorized no power can remove it except the Congress of the United States. The Secretary of War has no such power.

Judge Shiras decided, in the Keokuk bridge case, that power delegated by Congress to the Secretary of War to remove an obstruction was ultra vires, that it could not be delegated, that it remained alone in the Federal Legislature. So with your pier: once placed there in our harbor it can never be removed; it must remain for all time, and the Secretary of War will be powerless to act, whether any power be given him by statute or not.

Let me say one word in conclusion: There are no proper safeguards in this bill. The safeguard as to the approaches being subject to the approval of the commissioners of the sinking fund does not apply to the connections of the railways running down for 9 miles into our city. It only applies to the particular special point where the roadway of the bridge joins the highway. That is the meaning of the word "approach" according to the definition of the courts, and it can not be extended. There is no safeguard. The commissioners of the sinking fund, through a special committee, protested against this legislation in 1892 in the following language. They denounced it as "one of the most outrageous attempts at corporate aggrandizement which has ever been sought for at the expense of this municipality."

One spur has been cut off since——

Mr. DUNPHY. Was it in relation to the bill now before the House that that protest is made?

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir. But the bill before this House has only been altered in this respect: It cuts off a spur running to the north, but does not cut off the spur which bisects the city and runs down Eleventh avenue to Forty-second street. The language used by this gentleman, Mr. Meyer, the present comptroller of the city of New York, who is to be succeeded by my colleague [Mr. FITCH], and by Mr. Thomas T. C. T. Crain, the then chamberlain, is as follows:

> The bisection of this metropolis in the heart of one of its choicest and most valuable localities by a railway, which would serve as a connecting link between the great trunk system, over whose tracks there would pass by day and night a continuous procession of freight and passenger trains, would not fail to degrade that part of our city to the level of a railway junction and ruin a large portion of Manhattan Island, which now derives its chief value from its desirability for residential purposes.

I should like to know who in New York is in favor of this bill. It is true that some of our papers are in favor of the bill which passed this House some weeks ago. That bill permitted a pier, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, at Seventieth street; but I challenge gentlemen on the other side to produce one newspaper outside of the city of Washington, or to produce one authority in the city of New York, that shall be bold enough to declare that he or it is in favor of any measure which will permit the placing of a stone pier or tower in the channel of the river at Twenty-third street or Tenth street, or on the spot where this North River Bridge Company has located it.

Mr. DUNPHY. I desire to say, if my colleague will permit, that I will hand him here extracts from three New York papers of this date approving specifically the conference report which we are now discussing.

Mr. BARTLETT. I decline to yield.

Mr. DUNPHY. They are the New York Herald, the New York World, and the New York Times.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-three minutes, and he has twenty-two minutes left.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Chairman, this matter of the New York bridge has been before Congress for the last four years, and at almost every session the bill has been amended to meet the objections of some members of the New York delegation. When this bill passed the House last October the supposition was that the bill in its then form was perfectly satisfactory to all the Representatives from the city of New York, and until this amendment was added in the Senate no person pretended to make objection to it.

Now, I do not like the form of this bill, and never have; because I do not believe that it is one of the functions of Congress to place any limitation upon the exercise of power of the States of New York and New Jersey, and that the matter of approaches and the character of them and their location are rights which those people may exercise within the States, and should be determined by the local Legislatures and local authorities, and are not matters that Congress has jurisdiction over at all. But if we are to permit one company to obtain permission to exercise these rights, then I think, in all fairness, that every other company wishing to engage in the same business should be permitted to exercise identically the same rights. That is the objection which is now being made to this bill.

Some eight years ago Congress chartered another bridge company, to build a bridge across the North River and to enter New York at Twenty-third street. That charter prohibited the construction of any pier in the river and compelled the company to build a bridge 3,100 feet in length, consisting of only one span, something which has never been done in any place or in any country, and a matter which engineers say is not practicable or feasible. The bill that passed this House remitted the entire question to the War Department, giving them authority to determine what length the span should be, but putting this limitation upon it, that under no circumstances should the span be less than 2,000 feet in length.

The purpose of the committee in preparing the bill in that way was to obtain the intelligent judgment of the War Department and its Corps of Engineers, who undoubtedly know more about the possibilities of bridge-building than the average Representative from the city of New York can possibly pretend to. This bill says that the question as to having the pier in that river and the length of the span shall be decided by the War Department, and by nobody else. The old company did not have that right. They have been unable, through eight years of existence, to take one step forward in the prosecution of their enterprise. I think if this matter, in the case of one company, is to be intrusted to the War Department for adjudication and investigation, then the other company should be placed upon the same equality. It is not for Congress to fix their rights or give them benefits or favors. Our duty in the matter of bridging navigable streams is merely to grant permission to such companies as may be incorporated for that purpose by the States and to leave the States to regulate what the terms and conditions shall be. This amendment was insisted upon by the Senate simply in a spirit of fairness to all, and I think this House ought to agree to the report and concur with the amendment of the Senate. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman sits down I desire to ask him how far down the river the bill as agreed upon by the conference report allows a bridge to be built?

Mr. GEARY. The original New York and New Jersey Bridge bill limits it to Sixty-sixth street. The other company, incorporated some eight years ago, had a right to locate its bridge at Twenty-third street; neither of the companies is permitted under any circumstances to build a pier on the New York side, but the Secretary of War may permit the erection of a pier on the New Jersey side.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the right still given to the other company to build its bridge as far down as Twenty-third street?

Mr. GEARY. That is where their charter located it.

Mr. DINGLEY. And no amendment has been made in that respect?

Mr. GEARY. No amendment whatever. This merely enables them to submit their plans to the Secretary of War, and if, after investigation, he is satisfied that a span is necessary, they are to stand upon an equality with the other company. I now yield control of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY].

Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to argue as to the necessity for a bridge over the Hudson River between New York City and a point in New Jersey. I believe that such a structure, or such structures, over the Hudson River are really necessary, and I believe that an overwhelming majority of the people of New York and of the adjoining cities favor such structures. Favoring, as I do, the building of a bridge or bridges, I desire to see passed through the House a bill that will permit them to be built, and I do not desire to see passed through the House a bill intended to prevent their construction.

I think that Congress may as well leave this matter untouched as to put into the bill a provision that there must be but one span in the river. This bill does not provide that the bridge may have a pier; it provides that this matter shall be left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and that he may have hearings, may call witnesses, may take testimony; and having, as he will have, the benefit of the advice and the skill and the experience of the best engineers in this country, attached to his own Department, it seems to me that that is the best kind of a provision to put in this bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If he should decide not to have a pier, would the bridge be built?

Mr. DUNPHY. If he should decide that it is possible to build a suspension bridge and that a pier would interfere with the navigation, I suppose that then his decision would be that a suspension bridge must be constructed. But if the Secretary, after investigation, should come to the conclusion that it was an engineering impossibility to construct a suspension bridge over the Hudson at that point, then he might approve of plans that would permit a pier to be placed in the river at a point where it would interfere least with the navigation.

The longest suspension bridge in the world to-day is the New York and Brooklyn Bridge. The span of that bridge is 1,460 feet. The longest bridge in the world to-day is the bridge over the Forth River in Scotland. The longest span of that bridge is 1,760 feet. The narrowest point of the Hudson River at New York is 3,100 feet, and to put into the bill a provision such as that suggested by my colleague from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] means the building of a span twice as long as the longest now existing in the world, which would be, in my judgment, an absolute engineering impossibility. The Chief Engineer of the United States, Mr. Casey, when he appeared before the Senate committee, was asked whether it was possible to build a suspension bridge over the Hudson River. He said he did not care to give his opinion, because he was not a bridge expert, but if the committee insisted upon it he would state that his opinion was that such a thing was not possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we might as well authorize the construction of a bridge from here to the moon as pass a bill authorizing the building of a bridge over the Hudson with a single span, if such a bridge can not be built. That is why I am in favor of passing the bill in this form, because I think it provides sufficient protection to the public interests concerned by placing the whole matter finally in the discretion of the Department of War.

As to the question of interference with the navigation of the river, I desire to say this:

Within the past few months the Secretary of the Treasury has set aside in the Hudson River for an anchorage ground quite an extensive sheet of water. By setting aside this anchorage ground he, so to speak, takes so much area out of the regularly navigable waters.

Now, the proposed pier of the New York and New Jersey Bridge is to be well within that anchorage ground, well within the ground which by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury has been set aside as anchorage ground, and, as I have said, to that extent is taken out of the regularly navigable waters of the harbor.

Mr. WARNER. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. DUNPHY. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. If that is the case, and that pier is to be built right in the anchorage ground, will not that destroy the value of the ground for anchorage purposes, the tide sweeping back and forth there as it does?

Mr. DUNPHY. Not at all. The anchorage ground is a very large sheet of water, and the pier will not in any considerable degree interfere with its use.

Mr. Speaker, I will take just a minute or two more for the purpose of explaining one other point with reference to the question of navigation. The passenger traffic of the Hudson River, up and down, is about five millions annually; the passenger traffic across the river is at least one hundred millions annually. The amount of freight carried up and down the river is 18,000,000 tons; the amount of freight carried across the river is 130,000,000.

Now, I hold that if one or the other must give way, the lesser navigation ought to give way to the overwhelmingly greater navigation. Besides, all the tugs and tows of canal boats that come down the Hudson River have to pass through three bridges before they come to New York. In the first and second of those bridges the spans are only 125 feet wide, but at Poughkeepsie they pass through spans 50 feet wide, and yet it is claimed that when they get to New York, where the span will be at least 2,100 feet wide, the navigation will be obstructed. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Upon that committee there is a representative from the city and from the State of New York. He is also upon the subcommittee upon the subject of bridges. He was chosen, sir, not merely as representing the city and State of New York, as he well does, but, if I am not mistaken, somewhat also in view of the fact that his district lies upon both sides of New York harbor, and that within its precincts are the Maritime Exchange, the Produce Exchange, and the center of the great interests which are chiefly concerned in transportation to and from New York City.

Mr. DUNPHY. My colleague means the offices of those exchanges.

Mr. WARNER. I mean that the Chamber of Commerce has its meeting rooms there and that most of its members do business in that quarter. I mean that the Produce Exchange is there, and that half the produce of this great country that is exported goes abroad under the direction and through the agency of men who do business within the district which is represented by my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT], who addressed the House a few moments ago. That gentleman, sir, is present. He has dissented from the proposed agreement to this conference report. He has spoken in behalf of the city of New York and of the great interests which he represents, not as merely expressing a personal opinion—as to which I have no question but that my other colleague who has just spoken [Mr. DUNPHY] is in as good faith as he is—but as representing in a responsible capacity in this House the opinion of the commercial interests of New York upon this question. He has spoken so forcibly, so convincingly, against this conference report that he has left little for me to say. But, sir, I may perhaps use a moment or two.

It is perhaps known that New York Harbor as we see it upon the map is rather a great gateway to the port of New York, and that the real port of New York, on both sides of which are the great lines of steamships that ply between this country and other countries—down which come the great fleets of canalboats which bring the products of the West for transshipment to Europe—across which is transported the enormous commerce that my friend from New York has described, consists of what is called the North River, being a tidal estuary 8 or 9 miles long and from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in width, swept twice a day by the rush backward and forward of the tide that surges northward and southward. On both sides of that so-called North River—really the essential port of the city of New York—are centering more and more every day, have centered more and more since the East River Bridge and the comparative narrowness of the stream drove them out of the East River, the great interests concerned in the transportation of New York City.

Two years and a half ago a bill was introduced in this House, of which this is, perhaps, the great-grandchild. That bill did not permit a pier to be built in the North River. And when our commercial interests looked over the bill introduced in this House, they concluded there was no particular reason why they should oppose the bill upon that ground, and not being acquainted either with the course of proceedings in Congress, and still less with the proceedings through which this bill has been put, they did not know until about six weeks ago that the bill had been so altered as to provide for a pier being put in the midst of the river a thousand feet out into the tide. The very moment they were informed of this the Chamber of Commerce called a meeting, and after considering the question at one meeting deemed the matter of such great importance that they held a special meeting a month later, and they sent here the leading men who are interested in the commerce of New York to protest against this pier being permitted in that river, even at Sixty-sixth street.

The Maritime Exchange, having in its care the shipping interests of the city of New York, sent its delegation to protest against the measure. The Produce Exchange, with three thousand members, carrying on the export trade in produce of this great country, sent its committee down here, represented by the firm which perhaps more than any other firm is interested in marketing American produce abroad.

All these delegations were sent here to protest against putting a bridge in the river even at Sixty-sixth street. The question was squarely asked these gentlemen, "You, if anybody, are interested in the transportation which this bridge purports to favor; there is a question as to whether there can be a bridge within a short time unless this privilege is granted; you gentlemen who have most to gain if transportation is facilitated, and most to lose if transportation is obstructed, would you, even if you knew there could not be any bridge at all unless this privilege were granted, would you still oppose the pier being put in the river?"

And the representatives of the Produce Exchange, the representatives of the Maritime Exchange, the representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the men who do the business that this bridge pretends to assist, answered that unless it could be built without the pier they would rather have no bridge there until all eternity. The very men upon whose ingenuity in cheapening the cost of handling goods coming to and past the city of New York and benefiting this country by thus facilitating export, the men upon whose ingenuity the prosperity of our great Western country so largely depends, took this ground.

And now, sir, after they have put in this protest against the pier at Sixty-sixth street we find that in order, not to help anyone who has dared to come and ask it, but in order to reconcile and compromise differences between warring corporations, there comes a conference committee into this House in defiance of the wishes and judgment of the one New York member who has the responsibility of speaking in that regard, and proposes to give this company not merely the privilege of building a pier it Sixty-sixth street but also to give another company the privilege of putting a pier in the river down by Twenty-third street as well, at a part of the river crowded beyond comprehension of anyone who has not seen that teeming commerce.

It has been said that the amount of commerce crossing the river is infinitely greater than the commerce which comes down the river.

In one sense that is true, in another sense it is not; because a large proportion of the commerce, which is called commerce crossing the river, really starts above Twenty-third street—to some extent above Sixty-sixth street—and then comes down the river to the Jersey shore, or down by the Battery or rounds the Battery coming in the harbor and goes up the river to Wehauken and Fort Lee and other points above both these bridges, or reverses one or the other of these routes, and these will be obstructed by these proposed piers.

We are told that at Poughkeepsie there is no trouble with a smaller span. My colleague, who has already spoken, has given one of the reasons for this. There is not a tithe of the commerce going up and down the river near Poughkeepsie that there is going up and down, in the act of going across, the part of the river that I have described. There is another reason, however, and that is this: Poughkeepsie is 75 miles up the Hudson River; the location now in question is right down by New York Harbor. Through North River, at the place to which I am referring, the tide sweeps back and forth twice every day. A pier anywhere in that vicinity not merely destroys the anchorage where it stands, but makes it impossible for a boat with a long tow, in some cases half a mile long, such as we now find used to transport grain, to come within hundreds of feet of that pier without danger of damage which would ruin the profits of transportation.

Not to take up longer the time of this House, I will refer to only one other matter. I hear it insinuated about me that some of the newspapers favor this project. And I am bound to say that of all things hard to keep track of, have been the expressions, paid and unpaid, in regard to this matter, with which the newspapers, particularly of this city, Washington, have been filled whenever it was about to come up. But, sir, with all deference to the judgment of the great journals of New York (and they are great journals) it is proper to say, first, that the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, not merely the representative of the business interests of New York, but the great commercial paper of the continent, is opposed to this bill as it stands; and, second, that there is one body that knows better what the maritime interests of the port of New York demand than does any newspaper in New York; and that body is the Maritime Association of the Port of New York.

There is one body, sir, which knows better what is needed to facilitate the great foreign export business of the city of New York than any newspaper published in the city of New York, and that is the transportation committee of the Produce Exchange. There is one great body known all over this country for its enterprise, for its liberality, for its straight dealing, for its knowledge of what its interests are, who, if this were to be a benefit to anybody, if it would assist the transportation of manufactures or produce from and to the city of New York, would be the most benefited by it of any other class of persons, and that is the great Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, which is protesting against this bill.

And, Mr. Speaker, if there is any one man on whose judgment this House can more confidently rely than any other, who is more familiar with this business than any other, whose lead we can confidently follow, because he has been put upon the Committee of Commerce as the representative of the city of New York in this and other matters, on whose judgment we may safely rely, because he has shown that he has considered the matter and has given it impartial consideration as well, it is my colleague from the city of New York [Mr. BARTLETT], the representative of that city on the bridge committee of the Committee of Commerce, and who unites with me in protesting against the bill or rather whose lead in that protest I gladly follow.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the remainder of the time on this side.

Mr. DUNPHY. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the Fifty-first Congress, on the 11th day July, 1890, passed a bill chartering the North River Bridge Company. This bill provides that they may construct a bridge across the Hudson River at Twenty-third street, with a proviso that such bridge shall contain one single span, and that there shall be no intermediate spans between the two piers of the bridge.

People living in my district in good faith invested their money in this enterprise, and some two or three hundred thousand dollars has been actually paid in cash in the preparation of the undertaking for the construction of this bridge. Now, in the Fifty-second Congress the present bill was first introduced, and when that bill came before the House my colleague, Mr. DALZELL, and myself asked that the same provision should be inserted in that bill that was contained in the former one to which I have referred, namely, that there should be but a single span, or else that if they were permitted to put piers in the Hudson River the same privilege should be extended to the company which had been chartered by the Fifty-first Congress.

That provision was withheld. The bill was reintroduced in this Congress and was passed by the House. It went over from this House at the extra session of Congress to the Senate, and there the Senate insisted on an amendment providing that the same privileges, with reference to the location of piers, should be given to the company theretofore chartered by the Fifty-first Congress.

The adoption of the conference report now before the House will give to the company chartered by the Fifty-first Congress precisely the same privileges in reference to the location of piers that is granted to the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company. I believe it is only fair and just, morally right and equitable, that we should have the same privileges. I do not object to another bridge. We never have objected to it, but we do object to granting a charter which will give to the bridge company now being chartered a great advantage over that authorized by the Fifty-first Congress.

Now, in reference to the objection made and to the allegation that has been urged during this debate that under this bill, if it passes as recommended by the conference committee, we will have a right to insist on unreasonable tolls and charges for carrying the United States mails, I beg to refer the House to the third section of the bill which passed the Fifty-first Congress and which provides:

> That the bridge, with its approaches and road thereon constructed under the provisions of this act, shall be a lawful structure and a military and post-road, and no toll charges shall be made for the transfer over the same of the mails of the United States or for the right of way for United States postal telegraph purposes.

That is the language of the section, and how can the North River Bridge Company charge the Government one cent to carry the mails over the bridge, or how can the company charge the Government for the right to suspend its wires for postal telegraph purposes under these provisions? I do not care what provisions are inserted in the amendment, they do not refer to this question, but only to the privileges granted to the company. This is a restriction granted in consideration of declaring the bridge to be a post route, and it can not be and is not by the amendment of the Senate altered in any degree. Therefore, I undertake to say that on a fair construction of the language no lawyer will successfully contend that the adoption of this amendment will enable this company to charge the Government for mail or postal facilities.

Let me say one word in reference to the objection that piers at Twenty-third street will largely or more largely obstruct the navigation of the river than at Seventy-second street. We are told that the Hudson river, especially at its mouth, is covered almost constantly during all hours with ferryboats, steamboats, sailing boats and vessels of all kinds. That necessitates the slowest kind of navigation, and vessels which have to move slowly and cautiously in order to keep out of each other's way will have no difficulty in avoiding the piers in the river.

Mr. DUNPHY. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. COVERT].

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Speaker, it will be conceded, even by the most earnest and vigorous opponent of this measure, that for very many years a demand has come up from the people of the two States of New York and New Jersey for the construction of a bridge across the North River. The people of these two sovereign States, speaking for themselves, whenever and wherever they could voice their sentiment upon this question, have asked for the construction of a bridge as a matter of imperative necessity; and yielding to the demands of the people of these two States, their State Legislatures severally enacted laws for the construction of this bridge.

I had the honor, sir, in the last Congress, to introduce in this Chamber the formal, customary bill, giving the grant so far as the people of the United States could give it, to this bridge company to carry out the work already authorized by the Legislatures of the two States.

I took the position in the former discussion, as I take the position now, that there is not on this floor on either side any fair-minded man who would want to intervene to prevent the passage of this bill, and in securing this desired boon to the people of two sovereign States, unless these honest, fair-minded members of this House feared that the carrying out of the people's will in this direction might be regarded as an impediment to the navigation of the Hudson River.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I claim that this House should summarily dismiss very much that my esteemed friends and colleagues have said who have opposed this measure; this House should dismiss the appeal eloquently made by my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT] in behalf of what he stated to be honesty and good government. I want to ask right here, in parenthesis, whom does my friend attack? Whom does he accuse, in connection with this measure, of a want of honesty? Whom does he accuse, among those who support this proposition, of any desire to do anything except to legislate in the interests of good government? Dismissing all these generalities, and worse than generalities, let us come to the sole and only question pending before this House in connection with this bill. That question is, will this proposed structure be an interference with the navigation of the Hudson River? If so, let us condemn this bill, let us vote it down; but if this measure, with the amendments that have been added to it on the Senate side, preserves the navigation of that stream, let us, "in the interest of honesty and good government," carry out the expressed wish and will of the people of New York and New Jersey.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will this be an impediment to navigation? Perhaps we who constitute the membership of this House, having very many matters that engage our attention from day to day and from week to week, can not go into all details of governmental affairs; but we and the people have duly constituted agents and authorities, whose duty it is to determine upon all matters coming before them officially. In this connection the Secretary of War is properly made the sole judge and arbiter. I ask my friends on this floor—I do not care upon which side of this Chamber they sit—to carefully examine the provisions of the pending bill, and the amendments that have been added to it in the Senate, and then to tell me whether any safeguard has been omitted in the original bill or amendments?

Before a single stone can be placed, before a single timber can be put in position, so far as the construction of this bridge is concerned, the Secretary of War, through the Engineer Corps, must pass upon the question as to whether the proposed improvement will or will not obstruct the navigation of the river. If he says yes, it will be an obstruction, that is the end to the building of this bridge under this bill. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is the only question pending before this body. My colleague [Mr. DUNPHY] has made the statement that the pier contemplated or permitted, but not specially directed in the bill, is to be placed upon the New Jersey side of the river.

The State of New Jersey, in the charter which it granted, expressly and in terms permitted the construction of a pier upon its side of the Hudson. My colleague has pointed out the fact that under existing conditions it can not be an impediment to navigation, but I submit again that all that is outside of this discussion so far as this House is concerned. We make the duly constituted authorities, the Secretary of War and his Bureau of Engineers, responsible. The Secretary stands as a guard, as a wall, to protect the interest sof the Chamber of Commerce, the Produce Exchange, or any other body of gentlemen who have appeared as protestants in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to say—and I do not want to discuss the merits of this matter—that over 80,000,000 people annually cross and recross the Hudson River between New York and New Jersey.

Mr. DUNPHY. One hundred millions.

Mr. COVERT. One hundred millions, I am told. One hundred and thirty million tons of freight are annually carried across that river, and this immense body of travel, this immense volume of freight, is subjected to delays at times by reason of fogs, during the winter season by obstructions of ice, and at all times by the number of craft in the river. These vexatious embarrassments and delays would be saved by the construction of this bridge, and the large interests involved would thereby be conserved and promoted.

Mr. Speaker, but one word and I shall close. I think I am correctly informed that up to the time of the passage of the Senate amendment, both of my colleagues, (Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. WARNER), who so vigorously oppose this bill, were in favor of its enactment.

Mr. WARNER. We are not in favor of its enactment, so far as I am concerned. And I am opposed to concurring in the Senate amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNPHY. I yield my colleague one minute more.

Mr. COVERT. My recollection was that my colleague [Mr. WARNER]——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DUNPHY. I allow him one minute more.

Mr. COVERT. My recollection is that my colleague [Mr. WARNER], after certain concessions had been made to him on the floor, expressed his concurrence in the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Not at all; I had some amendment made.

Mr. DUNPHY. You did not vote against the bill.

Mr. COVERT. However that may be, the empire State of New York is represented in the other branch of Congress by its two Senators, both of whom strenuously favor this bill. Let me say, in addition, that I understand the great objection comes to this measure from the fact that privileges are granted to another corporation upon its compliance with the provisions that guard the construction of this bridge; and the objection is made that this other bridge may be in some unknown way objectionable; that it may, perhaps, if built, at some future time prejudice some interest or interests now unknown or undetermined.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there is scarcely a river in this country of anything like the importance of the Hudson that has not four or five bridges over it at near points and constructed comparatively closely together. The people of New York and New Jersey think, and properly so, that the more bridges they have the better it will be for both those States, and the better it will be for the interests of the whole country.

Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Speaker, I think the other side ought to consume the remainder of their time now.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to make one statement in answer to the gentleman [Mr. COVERT]. I have never, at any time, been in favor of this bill. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, as I have but a minute, I shall merely attempt to advance a single idea with reference to the bill under consideration. If nature had placed an obstruction in the harbor of New York City where it is proposed to permit a corporation under the terms of this bill to impede navigation, who can doubt that the Government of the United States would have been asked to spend millions of dollars, yes, tens of millions, if necessary, to remove such obstruction. And here it is proposed to give to a corporation permission to narrow the entrance, or rather the passageway, between the interior of the nation and the ocean through this imperial gateway which has contributed so much to the prosperity of the metropolis of America.

Again, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this House can safely rely on the unanimous testimony of all the great commercial bodies of the city of New York, whose interests, certainly, are those of the whole nation as well as of that city—such bodies as the Chamber of Commerce, the Maritime Association, the Boatmen's Association, the Pilots' Association, and others—and whose united protests are so ably voiced by the representatives of New York on the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I humbly submit, while uniting my protest with this formidable array, that this House should have some deference to the voices of the business and commercial bodies of the city chiefly interested in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, when I came to this body, I believe I came in a dual capacity; first as the agent of the General Government for my people, and then as their agent, to see that no injury should be inflicted upon their interests in the performance of my duty as their agent to the General Government. That is what I understand the position of a member of this House to be. When I see the members from some particular locality opposing a measure which threatens their interests, my sympathies are with them. I believe they are, or ought to be, the best judges of what their several localities want; and I think it comes with bad grace from gentlemen from other portions of the country to wield such a powerful force as has been developed in favor of this bill in the interest of a corporation and against the protest of the people to be affected by its passage. I want to know what interest the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], who spoke so vigorously for this corporation measure, has in advocating its passage against the protest of the authorities of the city of New York, and against the protest of its commercial life, and the protest of the Representatives of New York upon this floor.

Speaking for New Jersey, I know something of the black-horse cavalry force and the way they do their work at Trenton sometimes. I know and am somewhat familiar with the way the black horse does business around about Legislatures, because I have been there, and have helped to run them out. This is a matter in which the people of New Jersey are said by the gentlemen of New York to take great interest; I have heard of no crying voice coming up from New Jersey, begging me to peddle away the interest of the people of New York and New Jersey to accommodate the corporation behind this measure; and from the best view I am able to take of it, this bill is purely a speculative measure pushed by interested parties to see how much they can make out of the charter. This is about the size of granting this corporation this franchise. I think it will be a gross insult to the rights and to the judgment of the men from New York who are most immediately and directly interested in it—an insult for gentlemen from other portions of this country to vote against their protest in favor of this corporation.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know nor allege that there are sinister influences behind this bill or behind the bill which already has been passed by the House of Representatives giving a charter to a North River Bridge Company. But I want to call the attention of this House to the manner in which the other bill was passed. It was brought up here in the Fifty-first Congress sandwiched between bills granting charters for bridges over country streams. The House was entirely unaware of its importance. It was run in between insignificant bills and slipped over the ways of legislation unnoticed. It passed the House without one word being said either in its favor or against it. A word would have led to a discussion that might have defeated it. I know that the gentlemen who were back of that bill congratulated themselves on the trick that they had played upon the House, and possibly very justly. Their bill provided for a suspension bridge at Twenty-third street.

Now, I want to call attention to the way in which this bill under discussion was brought into the House. It was introduced on a Thursday and reported from the committee on a Monday; introduced by a gentleman not a member of the New York City delegation, and reported back to the House before any member of that delegation knew that it was in committee. By the action of the united New York delegation the bill was sent from the House back to the committee to give the New York authorities a hearing. The mayor of the city of New York appeared before the committee by his private secretary, and the gentleman from New York [Col. FELLOWS] and myself appeared with the secretary and presented the case of the city against the bill. That bill contained a proviso which gave that company control of all the approaches to the bridge in the city of New York. It gave them power to lay tracks for 9 miles through the streets of the city. In accordance with our protest, the committee reported the bill to the House with that provision stricken out. The city authorities being satisfied, we withdrew our opposition to the bill, and it passed the House.

Mr. DUNPHY. And is not that provision now in the bill?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is now in it. I supported the bill, I say, as it came from the committee. The Senate amended the proposition, so as to allow the other company the privilege of also placing a pier in the river. Now the bill has been put into conference, and the conference committee has not only reported the bill with a provision for a pier in the river at Sixty-sixth street, but has ingrafted upon it a proposition for a pier in the river at Twenty-third street. Under the original charter in the first bill two piers were to be built, each at the pier line, with a suspension bridge between. Now this other corporation is brought in and given all the privileges of the new one.

After this bill went to a conference committee, no wonder that the Chamber of Commerce of New York awoke. No wonder that the Maritime Association awoke, and that the Produce Exchange sprang from its lethargy. The commerce of the city was threatened. They sent down here delegations to protest against the passage of the amended bill. The Hon. J. Edward Simmons, president of the Board of Commerce, and as righteous a Democrat as the Lord ever made, appeared at the head of one of these committees. These gentlemen have entered their protest. They have asked the members from the city of New York to vote against the passage of this bill. In obedience to that request, I intend to record my vote against it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNPHY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. CUMMINGS. My time is out.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that my colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS] may have ten minutes more in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr DUNPHY. If they will agree that we may have ten minutes more, I will have no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is to be added to the time already given for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OUTHWAITE). That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. DUNPHY. I object, unless our side be allowed ten minutes additional.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objections, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] will proceed.

Mr. DUNPHY. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. DUNPHY. The gentleman stated to the House a moment ago that the head of the committee which came down here from the Produce Exchange was Mr. J. Edward Simmons.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNPHY. Does the gentleman know that Mr. Simmons signed the petition addressed to this Congress favoring the construction of the New York and New Jersey bridge over the Hudson River with a pier in the river?

Mr. CUMMINGS. "The gentleman knows" that Mr. J. Edward Simmons appeared before the New York delegation here at the head of a delegation from the Chamber of Commerce and pleaded with them to vote against this bill, saying that the people of New York would rather have no bridge at all than have the river filled with these piers. That is what "the gentleman from New York" knows. He knows nothing about any signatures and cares less.

Mr. DUNPHY. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. FELLOWS], who sits alongside of him, has the petition.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] will not deny that Mr. J. Edward Simmons is against this bill as it comes from the conference committee.

Mr. DUNPHY. I do not deny it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is said that the building of these piers in the Hudson River will not interfere with the navigation of the river or the commerce of the port of New York. Last Friday night I went to New York. We arrived at Jersey City at 9 o'clock and had to wait one hour for a boat, owing to a fog. When the boat reached the slip her guards had been torn off in a collision. It was only an instance of the danger of river travel. Hundreds of vessels are plying between New York and the New Jersey shore hourly, day and night. If these piers are built they will increase the dangers. They will lie in the path of ferryboats running from New York to New Jersey and back. Not only this, but every day there are thousands of cars of every kind loaded with freight taken upon scows from the larger piers across the river in New York to the piers in New York, where the contents are transshipped to European vessels. These cars will never run over your bridge, because it would cost more for the cartage from the New Jersey terminus to the piers where the European steamers lie than it does to take them on the floats from the New Jersey side directly to their docks. You endanger this traffic by your piers. You endanger all traffic.

But I want to call your attention to another fact. The city of New York and the city of Brooklyn built the Brooklyn bridge. The city of New York and the cities in New Jersey are fully as able to build the proposed bridge. But private companies come in and seize the privilege, and here we have two of them, one owning a franchise and the other seeking one. Grant it, and you may find them consolidated afterwards, and their privileges sold to foreign corporations as a speculation. The commerce of the city is thus to be endangered to secure privileges for a grasping corporation, unwilling to spend the money necessary for a suspension bridge. The talk about engineers being unable to build such a bridge is twaddle. The charter granted in the Fifty-first Congress was satisfactory to the persons concerned. It granted a right to build a suspension bridge based upon the report of a competent engineer that the construction of such a bridge was feasible.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some of my objections to the bill now under consideration. They were presented and urged by the gentlemen who came down from the city of New York to protest against the enactment of this bill. Another point to which I wish to call attention is the fact that it is denied upon this floor that these piers would interfere with the anchorage of vessels in the North River. Does any gentleman know how vessels swing when at anchor? When the tide turns she swings with it. You can anchor a vessel, and with every change in the wind she swings.

The piers would always be in the way. These piers, 100 feet square, would be a constant menace to commerce, and destroy the value of one of the greatest harbors in the world. The river to-day is so filled with craft of all kinds that collisions are of almost daily occurrence. With these piers as an added obstruction, the long strings of canal boats brought down from Albany by tugboats, as well as the innumerable other features of commerce displayed in the North River, will be menaced if not destroyed by the proposed legislation. The piers will endanger and not benefit the interests of the city of New York.

I will yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Gen. SICKLES.]

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, this measure has in it something more than a mere local interest. It would appear from the course of debate that it is only a local question. I think I may say that whatever affects the commerce of the great city of New York and its harbor—the port of New York—is a subject of general if not of national interest.

I am not opposed to a bridge properly constructed to facilitate that kind of commerce that is transported over railways; but I am opposed to any sort of structure that interferes substantially or seriously with navigation; and my impression is, and I think it is the better one in New York of those who have given most attention to the subject and are best informed, that in the present state of the matter as presented by this bill its passage would be received with much regret by the class of men to whom I refer and who are perhaps more directly interested in it than any others.

I have understood from my constituents that in the original form in which the bill was passed by this House it was substantially satisfactory; but the modifications it has undergone in the conference committee and elsewhere are not satisfactory; and I shall feel constrained, in the discharge of my duty and in the expression of the better opinion to which I have referred in our city, to vote against the report.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. BARTLETT. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no time remaining to the side represented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. DUNPHY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS].

Mr. FELLOWS. How much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to the original agreement there are fourteen minutes.

Mr. FELLOWS. And there were ten minutes added to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, ten minutes more will be allowed.

Mr. FELLOWS. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in the observations it will be my pleasure to address to the House, the last words I shall speak upon any subject pending before it, they may not be tinged with passion or at all affected or colored by local prejudices.

The question is far broader than that which represents the desire of a district, or even of two great States. The question is one that directly and personally affects every citizen of the United States who travels, and every producer in the United States who has anything to contribute to our common civilization.

The railroads that have their termini at Jersey City bring there in twelve months eighty millions and more of people who are seeking ingress into New York City. More than one hundred millions of people cross that river from Jersey City to New York, of whom eighty millions are brought there by the railroads. They are subjected to the possible inconveniences and delays of our present ferry system.

Everyone knows that during the inclement season now beginning that stream is filled with ice, at times hindering the passage across it for hours. It is, therefore, altogether desirable, in the interests of those who seek ingress to or outlet from the city of New York, that there should be swift, ample, ready means of conveyance, unhindered by storm, unobstructed by difficulties.

But there come by the railroads that terminate at Jersey City 135,000,000 tons of freight, the products of the workers of the soil and those who labor in the manufactures of this country. It comes to that great point of distribution, to that center of traffic, from which all this material is distributed throughout the earth.

Mr. GEAR. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FELLOWS. If it is simply for a question.

Mr. GEAR. It is only for a question. Is not a large amount of the produce that comes to that point from the West landed on the Jersey side, and there loaded into vessels?

Mr. FELLOWS. Some of it.

Mr. GEAR. Into outgoing steamers?

Mr. FELLOWS. Some of it.

Several MEMBERS. All of it.

Mr. FELLOWS. Oh, no. Gentlemen should not attempt to befog this question with any utterances calculated to mislead the House. Some of this freight is loaded into outgoing steamers on the Jersey side.

Mr. GEAR. I only want to ask a proper question. I am not trying to befog the question.

Mr. FELLOWS. Oh, no. I was referring to the comments that were made by my colleagues here that all of that outgoing freight was loaded on the Jersey side. The greater lines of ships that ply between our port and Europe have their docks upon the New York side. Those that carry by far the most passengers and freight are on the New York side. I do not know how much of this traffic stays upon the New Jersey side by reason of the fact that the difficulty which we are seeking to overcome exists in the way of proper facilities for reaching our city.

I know that the point of destination when it starts is New York. I know that the interests represented are owned in New York. If, for the purpose of transacting their business, they have to go to other States, if we are deprived of just so much of commerce to which we are fairly entitled by our location, by our enterprise, by our capital, it seems a little strange that the Representatives of the city of New York should be found opposing that additional benefit to the great metropolis.

I can readily understand why objections should be made to this measure by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN]. Out of all this vast production, which seeks New York as the point of destination, New Jersey acquires a certain part by reason of the hindrances which nature has interposed between us and the rest of the world. Build this bridge, and the traffic of the West, like the traffic of the North and the East, would find its natural point of distribution at New York City.

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. FELLOWS. If it is a question. I have but twenty-four minutes.

Mr. DUNN. I ask the gentleman if a law was passed in New Jersey favoring the bridge bill; and does he know how it was passed? If he does not, there are people here who can tell him.

Mr. FELLOWS. I think it quite likely. I am not acquainted with the mysteries of New Jersey politics. I do not know how far the black-horse cavalry may intervene in pushing measures through the Legislature or in sending members to Congress. [Laughter.] And I do not care. Let New Jersey transact her politics in her own way. I think that the recorded sentiment of New Jersey is the best expression of New Jersey's judgment. When I find the gentleman from New Jersey representing a New Jersey district upon this floor, I take it it is because New Jersey wants him. And when New Jersey passes a bill through her Legislature by a large majority, I take it it is because New Jersey wants the bill passed.

Mr. DUNN. New Jersey had not in contemplation the passage of such a bill as this.

Mr. FELLOWS. New Jersey passed a bill which confirms the construction of the bridge proposed by this bill. That brings me right down to the consideration of the question, which I apprehend should control the action of this House as to whether there is a necessity for such a construction or not. There are statements made here, and unchallenged, as to the number of people who seek access to the city of New York by a bridge from the New Jersey shore.

Then there is the vast amount of freight which seeks to find the point from which it may be distributed to the inhabitants of the world, which I think furnishes an adequate reason why every citizen of the United States has felt the importance of a structure which would enable him more easily and more cheaply to reach the city of New York, and with less delay in time.

I think that every citizen of New York and Brooklyn, and that mighty tide of population which flows into those two cities, almost 6,000,000 in extent, the homes of which can be seen from the domes of our buildings in New York City, have felt a sense of humiliation from the fact that the great metropolis of the country had not in the years gone by, in the strides of enterprise and civilization, linked herself in closer union with her sister States of the Republic. Certainly no one will deny that there is a great necessity for the construction of a bridge which will unite New York with the rest of the Republic, which will give her unhindered and unchallenged intercourse with her sister States.

But I am met here with the statement that, although necessary, it will be an obstruction in the river. There is force in that objection. There is a great deal of sound sense in the argument made upon that point. There would seem to be a great deal of force presented by the gentleman from Westchester, who states that if this obstruction were put in the river by nature the Government would have spent tens of millions of dollars for the purpose of removing it. If the Government had built a monument of solid granite at the place where it is proposed to construct this shaft, which is called the west pier of that bridge, I apprehend that there is no man upon the floor of the House of Representatives who would ever vote one dollar for its removal, because I assert, and I challenge contradiction on the part of anybody who is familiar with the river at the place where this bridge is sought to be located, that it would not be in any sense nor could it be made a hindrance to navigation. No navigation goes where that pier is proposed to be placed.

Sir, I am as familiar with the upper part of the city of New York as any gentleman upon this floor. I have made it my home for a great many years. I have spent hours and days upon the river there, and I know the course of the channel Day after day and night after night I have seen the great steamers come up and down the river. I know the course they pursue, and I know that in passing Seventy-sixth street they do not come within a thousand feet of the western pier of this bridge. The pier is 2,100 feet away from the New York side. On the New Jersey side a thousand feet or a little less has been reserved, as you have heard, as an anchorage ground, not in the immediate vicinity of this contemplated pier alone, but for 2 or 3 miles up and down. I imagine that my distinguished colleague, my very esteemed friend from New York, although chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, will have to acquire much more of nautical experience before he can find seamen upon the river who, having 4 miles of leeway, will be so stupid in the navigation of a vessel as to swing it against the piers of this bridge. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me answer that remark. Does not my friend know that there are four ferries inside of those 4 miles plying their traffic over those "flats?" I suppose the gentleman thinks there is nothing but dew on them, but the fishermen stick shad poles down there in 20 feet of water.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to answer the question of my colleague [Mr. FELLOWS].

Mr. FELLOWS. I can not yield to an interruption now.

Mr. WARNER. Well, let me say that we are ready to contradict your statement if you give us an opportunity. Why, the river is 40 feet deep at the place where this pier must be. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. FELLOWS. I do not, and I do not care whether it is 400 feet deep. My statement is still true, that vessels do not generally go in that part of the river.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FELLOWS. The line of navigation is far east of that, in toward the New York shore. Everybody who lives in New York and has observed the navigation of that river knows that this is the case. But more than that, Mr. Speaker, the navigation of that part of the Hudson River is comparatively an exceedingly scanty and limited navigation. That stream is not an estuary, as my colleague [Mr. WARNER] has imagined it to be.

The Hudson or North River rises to a dignity far above that. It is not an estuary, it is not a mere overflow of the ocean or bay. It is river, a majestic river, a broad river, having its sources up close to the Canada line, and flowing through almost the entire extent of our State to the ocean. But the East River is an estuary. At Fort Schuyler, but a few miles from the city of New York, what is known as Long Island Sound, ceases, and the "East River" begins; in other words, the sound narrows down to a stream that we have called the East River. The East River is nothing else than the southerly extremity of Long Island Sound. There is the rush of the ocean currents upon the eastern portion of that sound; there is the resistless sweep of the tides; there is the commotion created by its junction with Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Harlem River, constituting what is known as Hell Gate, the removal of which has been found so difficult.

All this makes the East River between New York and Brooklyn a turbulent, rapid, forceful stream, dangerous to navigate. Besides, it is very narrow as compared with the Hudson River; it is not a third of the width of the Hudson. Yet we put a bridge across that stream. Four times as many boats ply across the East River as ply upon the Hudson—yes, five times as many The East River between New York and Brooklyn is the busiest water scene on all this earth, except the Thames in the vicinity of London. It has no equal elsewhere. The traffic along the Hudson River is, comparatively, scant in the extreme.

In the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year but 18,000,000 tons of freight pass up and down that river, which is a very inconsiderable portion; and, although the Hudson is the tideway along which the stream of pleasure travel flows to its summer resorts and its summer homes, but 5,000,000 of people go up and down that river in the course of a year. Now, what is the transportation upon the East River? There there is a constant shuttle of ferryboats, crossing each other's course to and fro at every angle. They run up as high as the northern extremity of Manhattan Island. There is no part of the East River almost to its junction with the Sound that is not crossed by ferryboats. All the mighty tide of Sound steamers flows out each night and comes in each morning through that channel.

Stand on the Brooklyn Bridge for fifteen minutes from this hour in the day, or after 6 o'clock in the morning, and you will see such a tide of water commerce and traffic as can be witnessed in but two places in this world beside, one being the strait at the city of Detroit and the other the Thames at London. And yet that Brooklyn Bridge has proved no obstruction. Fourteen hundred and sixty feet only of waterway is allowed there. With 2,100 feet allowed for the little traffic of the Hudson with the channel upon the east side of the river so large, it would be utterly impossible for collisions to occur.

Difficulties at that point, therefore, should wait upon navigation. There can be no objection upon the ground that this bridge will be a hindrance to navigation.

But, sir, Administrations come and go; there are changes in our policy; as American citizens we are taught to believe that whoever may be the representatives in power in this or other branches of the Government, or whatever their differences upon questions of policy, they are all animated by the one desire of doing that which shall best contribute to the prosperity and general happiness of our country. So we may safely trust this matter of the protection of the navigation of the stream to the control of the United States Government—to the Secretary of War, in whose discretion it is placed by this bill. If, when he has consulted the engineers of the Government, uninfluenced by politics and unswayed by local prejudice or control, they decide that this would be an impediment to navigation, the bridge will not be built.

But, you say, "We will strike out this provision and compel you to make a single-pier bridge." That would be telling us, gentlemen, that we shall have no bridge at all. There is no engineer that dare pledge his reputation to-day to the construction of a single span 3,100 feet in length. It is so much in excess of anything ever attempted that science stands appalled at a contemplation even of its possibility. Will not the experience but a few years ago with the upper suspension bridge in that gulf at Niagara, a narrow one over which you can throw a stone; will not the awful calamity the other day with the span in the Ohio River; will not that catastrophe which filled the world with the sound of mourning at the Frith of Forth a few years ago, teach us that we may not too far trespass upon well-established natural laws?

We can not go on extending these spans indefinitely and crowding on them the tremendous weight that the traffic of eight railroad tracks, as contemplated in this bill, would bring, without exposing to danger and disaster every person who might ride across the bridge. Why is it that this lower bridge company that obtained this right some years ago has not exercised it? Simply because they could not build a single span. It is out of the power of man to do it. You deny us a bridge if you deny us this bill. We assure you, and you will have the additional guarantee of the Secretary of War, that the bridge will be no hindrance to navgation.

Now let me call your attention to one other fact and I am done. I have said that I shall speak no words of passion. I want my parting hours in this House to be as pleasant with my associates as all of my stay here has been. I want to experience, when I go, that keen bitterness of regret which I have experienced ever since I knew I had to go, over the fact that I am being separated from a companionship which without any respect of politics has been the most delightful of my public life. Therefore my colleague from the Seventh district of New York will believe that I speak in no disparaging way of him when I say, in answer to the statement protested with so much vehemence by my other colleague [Mr. WARNER], that he alone should speak for New York because he represents the district where all these great commercial interests are located, that it was my privilege in the Fifty-second Congress to represent the same district.

As between us, I represented it longer than he. I believe that I know its sentiment, its feelings, and the desires of its people as well as he. I represent another district now; but I feel as competent to speak for that district as does the gentleman who now, as its Representative, graces this Hall with his presence. I know that the interests of New York require and demand this bridge. I know that it is wanted only under such guaranties as will insure to every citizen of the country and to every pound of freight the highest privileges which this great structure is designed to confer.

I know that those who desire this bridge are too patriotic to wish it under any conditions which would impair the power of the United States to protect its navigable waters or would lay one single straw in the pathway of any citizen of our common Republic. But because we know that there is a universal pride in that great city, because it is one of the great products of our civilization, because all of the people of the United States first or last turn their faces toward New York for something that they want—for some pleasure they desire to gratify or something that they need for home comfort or luxury, or as the point of exchange and distribution from which their output goes to the rest of the world—I know that the people of the Union desire to see us brought into closer relation with the people of our sister States. Therefore we ask the passage of this bill.

My friend has told you of the products of the West that come down in canal boats. Does he not know that every single pound of that traffic passes under two bridges at Albany with a span between the piers of only 150 feet each, does he not know that every pound of it passes under the Poughkeepsie bridge with a span between its piers of only 500 feet, before it reaches the mighty Hudson at New York, where it will have an open spaceway of 2,100 feet; and that this traffic has never found any hindrance or obstacle in its passage up and down the Hudson? I want to say that this 2,100 feet is considerably more than the average width of the Hudson River above New York. There is not as much waterway on the average all the way to Troy, where the navigation ceases, as will be given under the piers of this bridge. Still gentlemen talk about this being a hindrance to navigation.

Mr. WARNER. Has the gentleman forgotten the tides?

Mr. FELLOWS. I have not forgotten the tides.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. FELLOWS took his seat amid applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to this conference report.

The question being taken, there were, on a division, (called for by Mr. WARNER)—ayes 126, noes 47.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being ayes 34, noes 118—more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 52, not voting 137; as follows:

Mr. BERRY with Mr. SHERMAN, on this vote.

Mr. FORMAN with Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, on this bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GEARY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December, present, they stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

HOUSE RESTAURANT KITCHEN.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at this time.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, touching condition of House restaurant kitchen, based upon report of A. P. Garden, captain of United States Capitol police, and submitted with a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms to the Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, Speaker of the House.

Your committee have made an inspection of the kitchen and find its condition as cleanly as the circumstances and surroundings will admit. There have been no improvements or extension of kitchen space to the House restaurant from its establishment up to the present time. When first constructed the House restaurant consisted of a lunch room, which is now used for that purpose, the members' dining room and ladies' dining room having been since added. The kitchen room is wholly inadequate, and so overcrowded that it is utterly impossible to properly cook and serve the food. While the House of Representatives has grown to 360 members, the facilities of the House restaurant kitchen have not been improved in the least since its original establishment.

The fire alluded to was a small affair, of no consequence whatever, so far as the committee could judge. It originated from a small kettle which contained a small quantity of lard, which became ignited from a gas jet left burning under the bottom of kettle. The walls and floor of the kitchen are constructed of rough stone, and it is a physical impossibility to keep them clear of roaches and other insects that usually infest such places.

The elevator used for bringing up food is in bad condition, entirely too small, and should be repaired. Your committee summoned the Architect of the Capitol, who was present during the investigation, and he was called upon to make such suggestions as would most speedily relieve the crowded condition of the kitchen. After a full conference with the Architect your committee is of the opinion that the improvements absolutely necessary in order to make the House restaurant kitchen what it should be can not be made during a session of Congress.

We therefore submit the above and ask permission to make a further report at a later day in the session, at which time your committee will submit plans and estimate of costs for necessary improvements.

J. H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman of Committee.

The SPEAKER. The report will lie on the table for the present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the standing and select committees for reports.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and that members having reports to present may have permission to hand them in at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. McRAE. I object.

The committees were called for reports; when bills of the following titles were severally presented, read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying reports, referred to the calendars named below, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT WITH THE STATE OF ARKANSAS.

By Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands: A bill (H. R. 4903) to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 117. The substitute (H. R. 4903) was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the original bill (H. R. 117) was ordered to lie on the table.

FORT LARAMIE MILITARY RESERVATION.

By Mr. MOON, from the Committee on the Public Lands: A bill (S. 591) to donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

By Mr. LATIMER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, a bill (H. R. 4458) to amend section 7 of "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891—to the House Calendar.

ADMISSION OF OKLAHOMA.

By Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, from the Committee on the Territories, a bill (H. AMENDMENT TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. KRIBBS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4185) to repeal the twelfth subdivision of section 4288 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. KRIBBS, also from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 195) to amend an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRODERICK, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past 4 oclock p. m.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move to dispense with the second morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent for the second morning hour to be dispensed with.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that it be dispensed with.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is a little bill on the Calendar that I would like to pass first.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then I will waive my request out of respect for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

The SPEAKER. The call rests with the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Chair will call the committees for the presentation of bills for consideration.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

CHARLES IVERSON GRAVES.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a bill on the Calendar to remove the political disabilities of Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, in the State of Georgia, which I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1141) to remove the political disabilities of Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, in the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed from Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, State of Georgia.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1141) to remove the political disabilities of Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, Ga., submitted the following report:

As shown by the application of Mr. Graves, the beneficiary of this bill, he graduated at the United States Naval Academy in the year 1857; after graduation and prior to the war of the rebellion, he served in the United States Navy as midshipman, passed midshipman, master, and lieutenant, respectively. That after the secession of Georgia, his native State, he entered the military service of the Confederate States, where he remained until the close of the war. He is now a legal citizen of the United States, residing at Rome, Ga., of good character and standing.

There are very numerous precedents for granting relief in cases of this kind, hence your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill has not been read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been read; but it can be read again, if the gentleman desires it. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was again reported.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. OUTHWAITE (when the Committee on Military Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be passed over, with the privilege of recurring to it again on the call.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HENRY JAMES.

Mr. McRAE (when the Committee on the Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 2896) for the relief of Henry James, residing in the original Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MOON].

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the bill be first reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Henry James shall have the right to enter and pay for within ninety days next after the passage of this act, at the appraisement made and reported by the United States Commissioners for the Hot Springs Reservation under act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, the following lot, as designated by the survey and map made by said Commissioners, which lot the said Henry James has improved or resided upon, and he shall pay to the receiver of public moneys at the land office in Little Rock, Ark., the appraisement aforesaid for said lot and shall receive a patent therefor as follows: Henry James, lot 4 in block 102.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That Henry James, who has improved and resides upon lot 4 in block 102, as designated by the survey and map made by the United States Commissioners for the Hot Springs Reservation, shall have the right to enter and pay for said lot at the land office in Little Rock, Ark., within ninety days next after the passage of this act, at and for the sum of $1,240, which is the value thereof as ascertained by an appraisement made under the act approved March 3, 1891."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the reading of this bill was not distinctly heard, and I hope my friend will not insist upon its passage until there has been some explanation of it.

Mr. McRAE. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MOON], who reported the bill. The report might be read. It will fully explain the nature of the bill.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, who introduced the bill originally.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a small bill, to carry into effect what has been the general policy of the Government, and the exception arose from no fault of the claimant. In being allowed to purchase this Government lot, on which the claimant has a home and other improvements, the Department suggested that the present value of the lot be required in payment; and that is provided for in the bill. As I stated at first, this is the general policy of the Government. There happened to be a suspension, that threw this case into an excepted state. I believe this is not the first time we have allowed homes to be preserved in that manner; and I would refer to the report for any details in the matter. The Department approves the bill, and there is no question about it.

The report (by Mr. MOON) was read as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2896) "for the relief of Henry James, residing in the original Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas," have had the same under consideration and report it back with the recommendation that the following substitute in the nature of an amendment be passed:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That Henry James, who has improved and resides upon lot 4, in block 102, as designated by the survey and map made by the United States commissioners for the Hot Springs Reservation, shall have the right to enter and pay for said lot at the land office in Little Rock, Ark., within ninety days next after the passage of this act, at and for the sum of $1,200, which is the value thereof as ascertained by an appraisement made under the act approved March 3, 1891."

The records in the Interior Department show that the said lot was appraised by the Hot Springs commissioners on the 12th day of December, 1879, at $60. Messrs. Raleigh and Gibbs, the registrar and receiver of the land office at Little Rock, Ark., were appointed by Secretary Noble as commissioners to appraise the unsold lots in the reservation under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 841), and on the 16th day of November, 1891, appraised this lot at $1,200. Property in the city of Hot Springs has very materially enhanced in value during the last fifteen years, and while the committee believe that Mr. James should have the right to purchase the lot upon which he resides and has improved, they think he should be required to pay the present value and should not be allowed to purchase at the value in 1879.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON IOWA RESERVATION, OKLAHOMA, TERRITORY.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4859) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Iowa reservation, Oklahoma Territory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every homestead settler on the public lands on the left bank of the Deep Fork River in the former Iowa Reservation, in the Territory of Oklahoma, restricted to less than 160 acres of land, may enter, under the homestead laws, other lands adjoining the land embraced in his original entry when such additional lands become subject to entry, which additional entry shall not, with the lands originally entered, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres: Provided, That where such adjoining entry is made residence shall not be required upon the lands so entered, but the residence and cultivation by the settler upon and of the land embraced in his original entry shall be considered residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon the land embraced in his additional entry; but such lands so entered shall be paid for, conformable to the terms of the act acquiring the same and opening it to homestead entry.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. Why not consider it in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. McRAE. It will take the time of going in and out of committee.

Mr. REED. What is it for?

Mr. McRAE. For the relief of certain settlers in Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, the bill will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McRAE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER], who reported the bill.

Mr. LATIMER. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LATIMER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 284) "For the relief of those settlers who made homestead entry of less than 160 acres of land in Oklahoma Territory," have had the same under consideration and report it back, with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table and the accompanying substitute therefor be passed.

The boundary line between the former Iowa Reservation and the Kickapoo Reservation is the Deep Fork River. When the lands in the Iowa Reservation were thrown open to settlers and entry, said stream had not been meandered, and settlers on the left bank thereof could not accurately determine how much land was embraced in the tracts upon which they settled. Although the Deep Fork River is a narrow, nonnavigable stream, not of the class which is subject to being meandered under the rules of the Land Office it was found necessary to survey the meander lines of said river in order to accurately determine the quantity of land embraced in each entry along the left bank thereof.

Upon the completion of the survey it was found upon examination that the entries made for the lands on the left bank of the Deep Fork River embraced areas varying in quantity from 8 acres upward. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, who recommends the substitute, has informed the committee that many letters from settlers on the left bank of said river have been received at the Land Office, from which it appears that it was the general belief of said settlers that as the surveys as originally made subdivided the lands crossed by said river in the regular manner into quarter sections that they would be entitled when the Kickapoo lands were opened to settlement and entry to include the portions of the quarter sections on the right bank of said river in the entries made by them for the portions of the same quarter sections on the left bank of the river.

As the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat., 577), provides for the disposal of the Kickapoo lands, and it is probable that they will be opened to settlement and entry, the bill is intended to afford relief to the parties referred to by allowing them to enter an additional quantity of adjoining lands.

Mr. LATIMER. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN].

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, when the Iowa Reservation was originally opened up in Oklahoma Territory there were settlers who settled upon the west side of it, on what is now known as the left bank of Deep Fork. There were some fractions of land that were located along there that the Government has since ascertained were lands of the Kickapoo Reservation, which they have since purchased. They ordered this stream, which is about 20 or 30 feet wide, to be meandered in making that survey. The settlers who had certain fractional pieces of the land have had their quantities largely reduced. Many of them have exhausted their homestead rights in that settlement, and they are brought down to about 6 or 8 acres. This bill permits these parties, when these other lands come in, to fill out a quarter section from the adjacent land. That is all there is in it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SELECTIONS FROM PUBLIC LANDS, MONTANA.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 83) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the State of Montana to select as a part of the lands granted the said State under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States, and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to make donations of public lands to such States," approved February 22, 1889, and an act entitled "An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated for other purposes," approved February 28, 1891, any of the lands in the Bitter Root Valley lying above the Lo Lo Fork of the Bitter Root River, mentioned and described in an act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from the Bitter Root Valley in the Territory of Montana," approved June 5, 1872: Provided, however, That no existing rights to any of the said lands initiated under any of the laws of the United States shall be invalidated by this act.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. LATIMER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 83) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands, have had the same under consideration and report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The necessity for the passage of the bill is clearly set out in the following report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, which is made a part of this report:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, October 14, 1893.

"SIR: On the 26th ultimo you transmitted a copy of H. R. bill 83, 'authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands,' with request for the views of the Department thereon. I inclose herewith copy of report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the same, and concur in his conclusion that no objection appears to its becoming a law.

"Very respectfully,
"HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

"Hon. T. C. McRAE,
"Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives."

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 10, 1893.

SIR: I am in receipt, by reference from you under date of the 28th ultimo, for report thereon of House bill No. 83, entitled "A bill authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands," submitted with letter from the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, dated the 26th ultimo.

The bill provides that it shall be lawful for the State of Montana to select as part of the lands granted to said State under the provisions of the act of February 22, 1889 (25 U. S. Stats., 676), and sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of February 28, 1891 (26 U. S. Stats., 796), any of the lands in the Bitter Root Valley lying above the Lo Lo Fork of the Bitter Root River, mentioned and described in the act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from the Bitter Root Valley, in the Territory of Montana," approved June 5, 1872.

These lands, the Indian title to which has been extinguished under the provisions of the act of June 5, 1872 (17 U. S. Stats., 226), are not, under existing laws, subject to selection by the State.

The act of June 5, 1872, above mentioned, provided that after survey the said lands should be open to settlement and be sold in legal subdivisions to actual settlers (settlements under the provisions of the homestead and preemption laws being prohibited) in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to any one person, at the price of $1.25 per acre. It also provided for entries of said lands under the town-site laws. The act of February 11, 1874 (18 U. S. Stats., 15), extended the benefits of the homestead law over the said lands.

The above constitutes all the legislation had on the subject of these lands up to the present time.

This bill, as I understand it, simply proposes to remove the restriction placed upon the disposal of the lands by former acts, and to make them subject to selection by the State in the same manner and to the same extent as are other public lands of the United States. The bill does not increase the amount which has heretofore been granted to the State of Montana under the act of February 22, 1889, but simply removes the restriction heretofore placed upon the disposal of the land, and puts the State on an equality with individuals in regard to the right of acquiring title to the land.

This being the case, and existing rights to the lands being protected by the provisions of the bill, I can see no objection to the proposed measure becoming a law.

The copy of the bill and letter from the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is simply to give the State of Montana the privilege of going into the Bitter Root Valley and selecting a certain portion of the public lands there for school purposes. The letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office which has just been read in the report explains this fully. He says:

This bill, as I understand it, simply proposes to remove the restriction placed upon the disposal of the lands by former acts, and to make them subject to selection by the State in the same manner and to the same extent as are other public lands of the United States. The bill does not increase the amount which has heretofore been granted to the State of Montana under the act of February 22, 1889, but simply removes the restriction heretofore placed upon the disposal of the land, and puts the State on an equality with individuals in regard to the right of acquiring title to the land.

I ask for the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I desire to say just a word. This bill was prepared under instructions of the State board of land commissioners of the State of Montana. Under the existing law we are authorized to select the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as school lands, but the existing law does not authorize us to select lands from the particular body of land which this bill will permit us to select from. The bill comes with the unanimous recommendation of the board of land commissioners, and it seems to be indorsed also by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and I presume there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. These lands, as I understand, were formerly an Indian reservation?

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes, sir; the Lo Lo Indian Reservation.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. And when that reservation was opened up for settlement the law provided only for homestead entries, and as the State could not make homestead entries it could not go in there under the law.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is a correct statement of the case. The Indians were removed from that reservation and the lands were opened to settlement, but under existing laws the State has no right to select any lands in that valley which formerly belonged to the Indian reservation.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to in any way or manner put in jeopardy the passage of this bill, but I wish to say a few words on the subject to which it relates. In the second session of the Fifty-second Congress an amendment was put upon the sundry civil appropriation bill, granting to North and South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington the preference right for sixty days after the filing of any township plat in any local land office to select lands that had been granted to the State for educational purposes; not, however, as against any bona fide homestead or preëmption settler who might be on the land at the time of the filing of the plat. Now, when the State comes to put that law into operation it generally finds that it is not quick enough to secure its rights, and I think there ought to be an extension of the time to about four months.

In Western Washington, for example, we have a great body of valuable timber land which, under the act of June 3, 1878, can be taken up at $2.50 an acre where it is chiefly valuable for timber. But the mill-owners and other individuals are quicker than the State, and when we come to select our lands we find that they have gotten people upon those timber lands, and so the State is cut out of its right to make selections from those valuable lands. I had intended to offer an amendment to this bill, but the gentleman from Arkansas said he had no time to consider it, and I call attention to the subject now in the hope that when the sundry civil appropriation bill comes before this House we may take up this question and try to give the new States a fair opportunity to select the lands that have been donated to them by Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Can the gentleman state whether the privilege given under this bill to the State of Montana is the same that has been given to other States?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The privilege given is this: When the lands were granted to Montana and the other new States there was found to be a valuable body of land located in what is known as the Bitter Root Valley, formerly an Indian reservation, and when Congress passed a law throwing that reservation open to settlement, it provided that it should be open to homestead settlement only.

Now, there is no way by which a State can make a homestead entry, and consequently those States could not select any of their lands from the reservation. In this case the land is surveyed. I should have attempted to put an amendment to this bill giving the same privilege to the other new States if we had any large body of surveyed lands; but unfortunately, in my State, all of the surveyed lands have been segregated from the public domain, and I am unable to designate any large body of surveyed public lands from which the State could select. The only thing we can do in North and South Dakota, Washington, Montana, and the other new States, is to reserve the land after it has been surveyed, the reservation not to operate against the bona fide settler who is on the land at the time of the filing of the plat.

This time ought to be extended. The State with its machinery and its official force can not get around as fast as individuals or corporations. We want to protect these lands, and give the State an opportunity to select the best lands; for most of these States have a provision in their constitutions that none of the lands granted them by Congress shall be sold for less than $10 an acre. Now, if mill-owners or other individuals or corporations can acquire valuable timber lands at $2.50 an acre, every man must recognize that they are going to do it. I hope that at a proper opportunity we shall be able to take up this subject and adopt such legislation as may enable our States to go forward and select these lands for our various educational institutions.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I think the purpose of this bill has been clearly stated, but I will say one word. It does not enlarge the school grant to Montana, but only allows that State to make good the grant already made in part out of a former Indian reservation which is now a part of the public domain and open to settlement under the homestead law. The bill only permits the State to deal with this land as Congress has allowed it to deal with other public lands in the State, or, in other words, to select it as school lands.

As to the proposition of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON], I am not prepared to say what the committee will do. I am inclined to think it right, but I have not considered it fully, and I shall object to introducing upon this bill any new proposition. We have considered this matter; we have not considered that. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon any amendments. I move the previous question on the third reading and passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman will withhold the demand for the previous question a moment I wish to remind him that I have already said I would not in any manner jeopardize the passage of this bill. I have not intimated any intention to move any amendment. But the gentleman is mistaken when he says he has not considered this question. He has considered it once at least, if he ever considers the appropriation bills in the House of Representatives, because a provision on this subject was upon one of those bills.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman will allow me to say that the very worst place in the world to pass land legislation is on an appropriation bill. More ill-considered land laws have been passed since I have been in Congress by tacking them upon appropriation bills than in any other way. I will add that my attention was not called to the provision in the sundry civil bill of last Congress, and perhaps I did not give it much consideration then. I do not think it was discussed then. I will consider it referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I am going to bring this question up again, if I can, when we reach the sundry civil bill; and I hope the gentleman will join me in the endeavor to have the question considered.

Mr. McRAE. I will not make the gentleman any promise to assist in putting this legislation upon the sundry civil bill.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I simply was asking that the gentleman join me in having the question considered.

Mr. McRAE. I move the previous question on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LATIMER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 2668) authorizing the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to approve postmasters' bonds; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COX, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home; and

A bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December, present, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

With an amendment as follows:

Strike out "Monday" and insert "Wednesday."

ERRONEOUS ENROLLMENT OF ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that in enrolling the resolution adopted by the House in relation to the holiday adjournment the enrolling clerk made an error. The resolution as passed provided for an adjournment of the two Houses until Wednesday, the 3d day of January, but this was erroneously enrolled as "Monday, the 3d day of January." It was simply an error in copying. The resolution as thus copied was transmitted to the Senate, and that body has adopted an amendment striking out "Monday" and inserting "Wednesday." But inasmuch as the resolution in the form actually passed by the House provided for an adjournment until Wednesday the 3d, the House, can not of course, concur in this amendment, because it would imply that there was some occasion for change in the action taken by the House. The Chair will therefore direct the Clerk to transmit to the Senate a correct copy of the resolution as adopted by the House, with the statement that the copy previously sent and upon which the Senate based its amendment, was erroneous.

Mr. REED. In that case, Mr. Speaker, the Senate would act upon the resolution again?

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion one moment. I simply want to ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the admission of New Mexico, so that by unanimous consent general debate may be closed and we may commence the reading of the bill by paragraphs. I think all will concur that I have been patient in submitting to the delays caused by the interjection of appropriation bills and other privileged measures.

Mr. REED. Regular order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can not consent to the request of the gentleman from Alabama. It is late enough now.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. T. O. TOWLES, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate, and delivered the following message:

I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that there was an error of engrossment in the concurrent resolution transmitted to the Senate yesterday providing for a recess of Congress, in that the resolution as it was engrossed provided for a recess from Thursday, the 21st day of December, 1893, to Monday, the 3d day of January, 1894, when the same should have been from Thursday, the 21st day of December, 1893, to Wednesday, January 3, 1894. I am further directed to present to the Senate the following resolution as a correct and true copy of the action of the House December 20, 1893, and to request the concurrence of the Senate therein:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 20, 1893.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December, present they stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington, representing that they are wool-growers, merchants, and business men of the North Pacific, and that, regardless of party, they state that as a result of the belief that wool is to be placed on the free list, the price of wool has fallen within the last twelve months from 15 cents to 6 cents per pound, and the value of their sheep has fallen from $2.50 to $1 per head.

The petitioners represent that under a free schedule foreign wools of the character competing with those grown in that section can be laid down in Boston to-day for 30 cents per scoured pound. They further represent that, allowing 70 per cent for shrinkage, their wools in the same market would be worth 9 cents per pound in the grease, and deducting scouring and marketing charges it would leave to the grower a net value of but 5 cents per pound, which they say is at least 5 cents per pound below the cost of the most economical production. They state their belief that if wool is placed upon the free list there will be no advance in the values they have above submitted. They further represent that wool-growing is one of the most prominent industries west of the Rocky Mountains, and that the continuance of the present range of values for their main products which may be fairly looked for under free wool will bring ruin to the sheep industry of the North Pacific and widespread loss and disaster to the mercantile and other interests dependent upon its prosperity. They also state that there are thousands of people in the North Pacific almost directly dependent upon the wool industry——

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if he is reading a memorial or making the brief statement of a memorial which the rule requires?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am not reading a memorial, but I am making a brief statement, according to the rule, of the subject matter of the petition.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desired to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the rule of the Senate requires a brief statement of a petition or memorial.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly: I understand the rule, and I do not wish to violate it. I am simply making a brief statement of the contents of the petition.

The petitioners further represent that with free wool one-half of these people will be obliged to seek a living and occupation elsewhere. Therefore they pray that wool be not placed on the free list. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I present the memorial of T. W. Ranskoll and 13 other citizens of Massachusetts, workers in the manufacture of gold and silver leaf, remonstrating against the reduction of duty on this product, as proposed in the so-called Wilson tariff bill, which they say will destroy their industry, or reduce their wages 50 per cent, and also remonstrating against making the duty on the articles referred to ad valorem. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of Michael W. Lynch and 10 other citizens of Boston, Mass., manufacturers and makers of cigars, praying for the imposition of a uniform rate of duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of P. W. Cloran and 10 other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the imposition of a uniform rate of duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of 11 cigar manufacturers, of Germantown, Ohio, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented sundry petitions of soldiers of the late war, citizens of Monroe, Scioto, and Coshocton Counties, in the State of Ohio, praying for an investigation of the Pension Bureau; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of W. E. Alden and other citizens of Auburn, Me., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of G. W. Pettingill, of Haverhill, Mass., and the petition of E. Walpole and 3 other citizens of Worcester, Mass., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of George W. Davis and 14 other citizens of Boston, Mass., workers in the manufacture of gold and silver leaf, remonstrating against any change in the present existing specific duty on gold, silver, aluminum, and metal leaf; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the harbor at San Francisco, Cal.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a petition of cigar manufacturers of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the imposition of a uniform rate of duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of employés of the Milwaukee (Wis.) Bag Company, praying that the import duty on bags be 10 per cent in excess of the duty on burlaps; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of F. H. Silvernail and 40 other citizens of Lakeville, Conn., employed in the manufacture of cutlery, remonstrating against a reduction of the duties on cutlery; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the memorial of William H. Elliott, W. H. Buckley, H. A. Wood, and 40 others, employés of the Great Falls Woolen Company, Great Falls, N. H., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill. The memorialists state that the passage of the bill would have a most disastrous effect; that if foreign-made goods were admitted to this country at such a rate of duty as the Wilson bill would fix, it would have the effect of either throwing them out of work entirely, or else cutting down their wages to about the same rate that is paid in Europe; and they desire Congress shall understand that if they are obliged to work for reduced wages they will hold responsible those members of Congress who vote for the passage of the bill. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of A. C. Clark and 10 others, citizens and business men of Sumter County, Fla., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for holding a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Ocala, Marion County, Fla.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDIAN WAR CLAIMS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WHITE of California. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate any and all matters not heretofore reported relative to the Indian war claims of the State of California, referred to and recited in the resolution of the Senate adopted December 19, 1889, and in so doing he shall report the amount of money the State of California claims to be yet due her by the United States as a full indemnity for all moneys by her expended and for all liability by her assumed under her laws not fully reimbursed by the United States, in any matters growing out of her efforts to suppress Indian depredations in said State, and upon the borders thereof, and to aid the United States in maintaining the "common defense."

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. President, I will state the object of the resolution. Executive Document No. 122 of the Fifty-first Congress contains a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury prepared in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 19th of December, 1889. There are certain matters of a supplemental character now in the possession of the Department which we desire to have presented to the Senate, and which we are informed at the Department can only be presented as the result of the adoption of such a resolution as I have proposed.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

PROPOSED BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, at the second session of the Fifty-first Congress I presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oregon, relative to the Torrey bankruptcy bill as a just and wise measure and demanding its early enactment. The Senate at that time, September 29, 1890, ordered the memorial printed. It is very brief, covering but two pages, and the copies are exhausted. I ask unanimous consent at this time that there be a reprint of the usual number, as it is a very important memorial.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to this matter. Owing to action recently taken elsewhere an impression seems to have gone abroad in the country that all hope of securing favorable legislation on the subject of a general bankruptcy act at this session of Congress is gone. This impression is not by any means justified by the facts. There are to-day pending in both Houses of Congress five bills on the subject of bankruptcy, and there seems to be a general disposition, if I may state it, upon the part of both Houses and the members generally of both Houses, that there should be some kind of legislation on this subject at the present session of Congress, the difference in sentiment and opinion being as to the character of the bill which should be enacted, many insisting that it should be a general bill covering both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, while upon the other hand it is claimed by others the bill should be confined simply to the subject of voluntary bankruptcy.

I myself introduced early in the last session what is known as the Torrey bill, and a similar bill or perhaps the same was introduced later on by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. Both bills are now pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and I simply desire to state that as one member of the Senate and a member of that committee I shall at the appropriate time, at an early day, do everything in my power to secure consideration of that bill in the committee, and, if possible, favorable action.

I may state further, if permitted, that if there ever has been a time in the history of this country when evidence was presented in a most emphatic form in favor of the establishment of a general system of bankruptcy in this country, it has been during the past summer. I believe there is a general desire throughout the country, not only upon the part of the debtor class but upon the part of the creditor class, for a fair law on this subject, and for this reason I shall do all I can to bring it to consideration at as early a date as possible.

SILVER COINAGE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. In a speech which I delivered on the 5th of September last I made a misquotation. I quoted what I am about to read as having been said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whereas it was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY]. In the hurry of the debate I did not observe in the print that the speakers were changed. In looking over the speech of the Senator from Ohio I did not observe that I had reached the end of his remarks and I quoted the passage from Mr. Bogy as coming from him. I wish to correct this error. The passage from Mr. Bogy, which I ascribed to the Senator from Ohio, is as follows:

> Our coinage act came into operation on the 1st of April, 1873, and constituted the gold one-dollar piece the sole unit of value, while it restricted the legal tender of the new silver trade dollar and the half dollar and subdivisions to an amount not exceeding $5 in one payment. Thus the double standard previously existing was finally abolished, and the United States as usual was influenced by Great Britain in making gold coin the only standard. This suits England, but does not suit us. I think with our large silver-producing capacity we should return to the double standard, at least in part, and this will constitute one of the means by which we will be enabled to resume specie payments.

This speech was delivered on the 5th of September last and I make the correction and will prepare it for the Reporter.

In this connection I would say that the honorable Senator from Ohio delivered a speech on the 12th of August, 1876, at Marietta, Ohio, which was reported at length, with subheadings, in the Cincinnati Gazette of August 14, 1876, in which he said:

> I do not now, fellow-citizens, enter fully upon the great question of the restoration of the old silver dollar, as the money of account, for it has not yet assumed a party aspect. I have given the subject the most careful consideration, and was the first to propose the recoining of the old silver dollar.

Again, in the same speech, the Senator is reported to have said:

> I was a member of the conference committee of the two Houses on the silver bill. I am not at liberty to state what occurred, except as is shown by the action of the two Houses. Both Houses were in favor of issuing the old dollar—the dollar in legal existence since 1792, containing 412.8 grains, and only demonetized in 1873, when it was worth 2 per cent more than the gold dollar. It was then, and for twenty years had been, only issued for export, and was not in circulation. Still, it was a legal standard of value, as well as gold, always had been, and it was the right of any debtor to pay in silver dollars as well as gold dollars. It was his legal option.
> The relative value of the two metals had often varied before, and still the right remained to the debtor to pay in either dollar, and, therefore, in a cheaper dollar. The mere disuse of the coinage of the silver dollar could not, and ought not to affect preëxisting contracts. And now, when all our domestic contracts have been based upon depreciated paper money, made a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except customs and duties and interest of the public debt, it would seem not only legal, but right, in the broadest sense of the term, that we should avail ourselves of the rapid and remarkable fall of silver bullion to recoin the old silver coins, including the old silver dollar, the oldest of our coins, and with them pay our depreciated notes, and thus restore the old coin standard.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with an amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 83) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands;

A bill (H. R. 2896) for the relief of Henry James, residing in the original Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas; and

A bill (H. R. 4859) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Iowa Reservation, Oklahoma Territory.

SUFFERERS IN FORD'S THEATER DISASTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments; which was, after the word "exempted," in line 7, to insert "during the fiscal year 1894, in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, which simply limits the operation of the joint resolution to the fiscal year 1894.

The motion was agreed to.

SCHOONER HENRY R. TILTON.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that Order of Business 114, being the bill (S. 901) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Henry R. Tilton, and of personal effects thereon, may be taken up for present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in the case?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report, the Chair is advised.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Missouri and other Senators, that this bill was very carefully considered at the last session of the last Congress, that it was reported unanimously, and passed the Senate, went to the House of Representatives, and was reported favorably in that body, but by reason of the excessive amount of business pending it was not taken up. It has been again before the Committee on Claims of the Senate at the present session and unanimously reported, the committee adopting the report which was filed during the last Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think there ought to be an amendment in line 11 of the bill, where it reads:

And he shall, in like manner, ascertain what was the reasonable value of the personal effects of each of the several officers and sailors on the said schooner at the time of her sinking.

While we have a general law which authorizes the payment to army officers for certain losses sustained by them without carelessness or negligence on their part, yet we confine the compensation to the value of such articles as are necessary and proper for such officers at the time in the line of duty. This would pay for gold watches; it would pay for pianos, and for personal effects of any kind which the officers might have on board the vessel. We have never gone that far.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would not that be right?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would not be right, because when on duty sailors are entitled to certain things under the law, and they are not entitled to have other things on board.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose that this vessel had been loaded with sugar or with salt, when she sunk of course the cargo would be lost, and would it not be right and proper and would not the Government be in duty bound to pay for the cargo as well as for the ship? If so, why should the bill not apply to the personal effects of the captain and the crew?

The rule which applies to army and navy officers in such cases, certainly would not apply to a vessel which was lost by reason of the careless firing at the proving ground at Sandy Hook.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator from Missouri will refer to lines 24 and 25 of the bill, he will see that a limitation is there made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I had not read the bill at the time I made the suggestion. I think the provision referred to by the Senator from Kansas will cover the ground.

Mr. MILLS. How came the vessel within the line of fire?

Mr. COCKRELL. She was not within the line of fire.

Mr. PEFFER. The vessel was not within the line of fire at all.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to have the facts stated.

Mr. PEFFER. The ordnance officers were exercising their guns, if I may use the expression, firing in a certain direction, as they usually do, and it seems that when the ball struck a sand bank, which within a very recent period had assumed a peculiar formation, there was a glance or a deflection of the shot away out of the line of fire, no one expecting or anticipating anything of the kind. The officers have set forth all the facts very clearly and fully before the committee, with diagrams with written statements, and with verbal explanations, and everything was made perfectly clear. While firing in this direction [indicating], the ship was passing along in that [indicating], and there was a deflection entirely out of the ordinary line of such things. It was purely an accident, which was unexpected and unprovided for.

Mr. PASCO. By reference to page 3 of the report will be seen a letter from Capt. Heath, which will serve as a reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Texas. Capt. Heath says:

A careful consideration of the circumstances connected with this unfortunate accident indicates that at the time of the firing the vessel was so far from the gun and from the line of fire as to render it reasonably certain that it could not be hit by any deviations from the line of fire that experience had shown were at all likely to occur, and that the accident was due to a combination of unexpected events growing out of the position of the gun when fired and the peculiar and unusual formation of the sand at the point which this shot happened to strike.

I think that fully replies to the inquiry of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. That covers the point of my inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas for the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to ascertain what was the reasonable value of the schooner Henry R. Tilton and the proportion thereof belonging to each of her several owners at the time she was sunk by a deflected projectile from a gun on the United States proving grounds at Sandy Hook on or about the 9th day of July, 1892; what was the reasonable value of the personal effects of each of the several officers and sailors, and to report to the Secretary of the Treasury the several amounts so ascertained, such amounts to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, the aggregate amount not to exceed $10,000, less the amount of the net proceeds of the sale of the schooner. The Secretary of the Treasury is also directed to pay to the officers and crew the several sums ascertained to have been the value of their personal effects lost, but the aggregate of the several sums shall not exceed $1,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a House concurrent resolution which is on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December, present, they stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. 83) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections for certain public lands;

A bill (H. R. 2896) for the relief of Henry James, residing in the original Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. 4859) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Iowa Reservation, Oklahoma Territory.

RECESS.

Mr. GORMAN (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and at the expiration of the recess (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

TRANSACTIONS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by me, which is Order of Business 33 on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon the immediate consideration of that resolution.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that there is a motion pending to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. I simply wish to make that disposition of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ah, that is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. PEFFER September 8, 1893, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether at any time or times, and when and how long, within three months last past, the national banks, or any of them, in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, failed to keep and maintain their bank reserves as required by law.

Second. In case it appears that said banks, or any of them, did so fail, during the time above-mentioned, to keep and maintain their lawful reserves, what was the amount of reserves on hand in the banks severally, and what was the amount required by law in each case to be kept on the days following—namely: July 31, August 10, August 20, August 31, and September 8.

Third. Whether at any time or times, and when and how long, within said period of three months, the said banks, or any of them, failed or refused to pay checks or drafts of their depositors on demand in currency.

Fourth. In case it appears that such checks and drafts of depositors were not promptly paid in currency, what disposition was made of them.

Fifth. In case it appears that said checks and drafts were passed through bank clearing houses and paid in clearing-house certificates, whether said banks, or any of them, had asked or received authority from the Treasury Department for making such payments of checks and drafts in clearing-house certificates, or by what authority of law it was done or permitted.

Sixth. Whether the Treasury Department or any and what officer thereof is officially connected with the New York bank clearing house, and if such connection does exist, what is the object and purpose thereof, and by what authority of law or regulation of the Department was such connection made and is maintained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. If there be no objection such will be the order. The Chair hears no objection.

INTERRUPTION OF INTERSTATE RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution introduced by me, which is Order of Business 37½ on the Calendar, in order that it may be disposed of in a similar manner. It is a resolution proposing an inquiry into interruption of interstate railway traffic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. PEFFER September 16, 1893, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be instructed to inquire whether and what legislation is necessary to prevent interruption of interstate railway traffic by lawless and unauthorized persons, and to punish persons guilty of robbery and murder committed on interstate railway trains.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], to strike out "Interstate Commerce" and insert "the Judiciary," so as to read:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed, etc.

Mr. GORMAN. I rather think that this is a matter which ought to go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PEFFER. That is what I thought in the first place, and I do not know but that this is a very good time to insist upon the original language. The question being on the motion to amend I withdraw my acceptance of it.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the amendment will not be agreed to. The Interstate Commerce Committee is the proper committee to consider this matter, and really it has in a general way the subject under investigation now. I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the purpose of saying exactly what the Senator from Maryland has said. I think the Interstate Commerce Committee is the only appropriate committee to consider the question.

Mr. PEFFER. That is the view I entertained upon the matter in the first place. I agree with the Senators from Maryland and Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out "Interstate Commerce" and insert "the Judiciary."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

LANDING OF FOREIGN CABLES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair) laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of State, which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State inform the Senate whether permission has been granted to any foreign cable telegraph company to land its line on the coast of the United States since the 1st day of March, 1893, and whether permission had been refused such company prior to that date. Also, what reasons now exist for granting such permission, if it was granted, that did not pertain when it was previously refused"—

I have the honor to state that no permission has been granted by this Department since March 1, 1893, to any foreign cable company to land its line on the coast of the United States; that several times prior to that date such permission was refused unless accepted on prescribed conditions; that the Secretary of State knows of no reason for granting such permission since March 1, 1893, that did not exist prior to that date; and that since March 1, 1893, he has not granted such permission either conditionally or unconditionally, knowing of no law of Congress authorizing him or any other executive officer to do so.

Copies of an application and argument for such permission, with the Department's reply thereto, are herewith transmitted.

Respectfully submitted.

W. Q. GRESHAM.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 21, 1893.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the communication lie on the table. I desire to call the attention of Congress to some matters connected with it and do not wish to do so until after the holiday recess.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be printed, with the accompanying documents.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the communication, with the accompanying documents, lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SIOUX INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. KYLE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas by Article XII of the treaty between the United States of America and different tribes of Sioux Indians, concluded April 29 et seq., 1868, and proclaimed February 24, 1869, it was provided that "no treaty for the cession of any portion or part of the reservation herein described which may be held in common shall be of any validity or force as against the said Indians, unless executed and signed by at least three-fourths of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in same;" and

Whereas the report made by the commission formed and acting under the two separate acts of Congress, both dated March 2, 1889, entitled "An act to divide a portion of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," and the other, the appropriation bill approved March 2, 1889, shows upon its face that it was signed by a number of adult Indians of the whole blood less in number than the three-fourths as provided in the said treaty proclaimed February 24, 1869, and that in order to obtain the necessary three-fourths aforesaid divers mixed bloods were solicited to, and were permitted to, and did sign such treaty made by the commission on the part of the United States, acting under said acts of Congress dated, as aforesaid, March 2, 1889; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior of the United States has decided, as it is claimed, that divers of the mixed bloods who signed as aforesaid such treaty made with said commission are not Indians in contemplation of law, and that they and their families are not entitled to any rights or privileges whatever in the land embraced in the cession to said commission, nor to any privileges whatsoever as Indians, and is about to cause them to be rejected from the so-called Indian reservations: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate forthwith copies of all orders, opinions, and directions that he has given in respect to the said mixed bloods or either of them, or to their families or any member thereof, together with copies of all reports, letters, documents, and written papers pertaining thereto.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to have the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. It had better be printed and lie over, I think. I object to its present consideration. It contains a number of the recitals of fact, which I presume are true, but I prefer that as it pertains to a very important subject-matter it should go over and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KYLE. If the Senator from Nebraska objects, of course it must go over.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that he strike out the word "forthwith." I think it is hardly respectful to the head of the Department to direct him to communicate forthwith.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, let that word be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution, under the objection of the Senator from Nebraska, has gone over under the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that modification.

Mr. MANDERSON. I withdraw the objection that the resolution may be modified. I think it should be done.

Mr. KYLE. I will modify the resolution by striking out the word "forthwith."

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand the Senator from South Dakota has so modified it.

Mr. BERRY. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is not here, and I desire to have the resolution go over until he is present.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have objected to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over, under the rule, on objection.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, until Wednesday, January 3, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. E. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

W. W. NEELY, DECEASED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of the findings of the court in the case of W. W. Neely, deceased, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WELLS, for this day.

ELIZABETH VOSS.

Mr. HAYES. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 855) to amend chapter 243 of the Laws of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 243 of the Laws of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss," be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the word "Imann" therein and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Mann;" and that said act shall have the same force and effect as if said word had been therein originally.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

That the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss," be, and hereby is, amended as follows: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Voss, formerly the widow of Jacob Mann, late of Company A, Sixteenth Regiment Iowa Infantry, to take effect from date of said former act."

Mr. HAYES. I would like to make a word of explanation, which I think will be all that is necessary, in relation to this matter.

Mr. KILGORE. I suppose unanimous consent has not yet been given.

The SPEAKER. It has not; but without objection the gentleman can explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAYES. This was a pension bill, an entirely meritorious case, which was reported in the last Congress and passed without objection or question. By reason of my own miserable writing the name of the soldier was spelled "Imann" in place of "Mann;" consequently the Pension Office has not been able to locate him, and of course the pension can not be granted. It was an error simply in printing the bill, and it was not discovered at the time.

Mr. KILGORE. The Pension Office can not find the man for whose relief the bill was passed, and now they want to find somebody on whom they can confer this pension?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all. This is an entirely meritorious case, and they simply want to have the proper name of the person who is entitled to receive the pension.

Mr. KILGORE. There was nobody lost in the shuffle, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAYES. Not at all.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYES, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

USE OF NAVAL FORCES—HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk and ask the immediate consideration of a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears by certain papers transmitted by the President in response to a resolution of the House that the Secretary of the Navy, on the 11th day of March, 1893, issued instructions to the admiral commanding the naval forces of the United States at the Hawaiian Islands to hold and employ such armed naval forces subject to the orders of one James H. Blount, said instructions containing the following words:

"You will consult freely with Mr. Blount and will obey any instructions you may receive from him regarding the course to be pursued at said islands by the force under your command;"

And whereas it appears by the same papers that said Blount did assume to exercise military command over such armed naval forces of the United States on the 31st day of March, 1893, by issuing the following orders to "haul down the United States ensign" and "to embark the troops" of the United States, to wit:

"HONOLULU, March 31, 1893.

"SIR: You are directed to haul down the United States ensign from the Government building and to embark the troops now on shore to the ships to which they belong.

"This will be executed at 11 o'clock on the 1st day of April.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"JAMES H. BLOUNT,
"Special Commissioner of the United States.

"Rear-Admiral J. S. SKERRETT,
"Commanding Pacific Squadron."

And whereas it appears by the papers referred to that the said admiral commanding the United States naval forces on the Pacific Station, acting under said instructions, did obey the military orders of said Blount by lowering the United States ensign and moving the armed forces of the United States "in obedience" to his (said Blount's) "directions," as is shown by the following official communication:

"U. S. S. MOHICAN, FLAGSHIP OF THE PACIFIC STATION,
"Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, April 1, 1893.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform Special Commissioner Blount that in obedience to his directions the United States ensign over the Government building was lowered at 11 a. m. of this date and the force withdrawn from the building and the place designated as Camp Boston at the same hour. I learn that quite a number of people congregated about the Government building at the time. The force of marines stationed there were relieved by a force of the Provisional Government. There was no demonstration made by the populace present; no cheering, nor any other signs of either joy or grief.

"I went on shore this afternoon and saw quite an access in numbers of those who were wearing the annexation club badge. There has been no evidence shown of unruly or riotous characters. Absolutely there appears to be peace and quiet.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. S. SKERRETT,
"Rear-Admiral, United States Navy,
"Commanding United States Naval Forces, Pacific Station."

And whereas it does not appear that said Blount, at the time of the issuance of said instructions by the Secretary of the Navy, or at the time of said Blount's issuance of said military orders to the commander of the armed naval forces of the United States to "haul down the United States ensign" and to "embark the troops" of the United States, or at the time of the execution of such orders, held any military rank or authority as an officer of the Navy of the United States, or that he held any constitutional authority by appointment or commission "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," by virtue of which he could lawfully assume command of the armed forces of the United States or order its "ensign hauled down" from the place where it had been raised "for the protection of the United States legation and the United States consulate and to secure the safety of American life and property:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives by what authority instructions were issued placing the armed naval forces of the United States and the use of its ensign under the orders and control of said Blount, and that the Secretary of the Navy is further directed to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all orders, directions, instructions, or official suggestions issued by him or any officer of the Navy Department or of the Navy since the 4th day of March, 1893, concerning the use or movements of the armed naval forces of the United States at the Hawaiian Islands.

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It calls for information from the Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. It must be referred.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to refer it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have not objected to its reference.

The SPEAKER. But it can not be read, except by unanimous consent. The method of introducing such resolutions is to hand them in at the desk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The rules make this a privileged resolution, and the committee must report it back.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very plain. Such resolutions must be introduced through the Speaker.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that it was a privileged resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I asked for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that it is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for its immediate consideration. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky and Mr. RAYNER objected.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly why I asked unanimous consent, so that the gentleman could object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presented it as a privileged resolution. It will be referred to the Committee on Naval Afairs.

REIMPORTATION OF AMERICAN CATTLE FROM MEXICO.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to favorably report the joint resolution (H. Res. 93) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle transporting them into Mexico to reimport the same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, and for other purposes; and I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a drought has existed in Southwest and Northwest Texas for a period of several years so severe as to practically destroy the grass upon the ranges therein, and causing so great a scarcity of grass and water that the stock in said vast region of Texas are and have been for months suffering and dying in large numbers; and

Whereas both sufficient water and grass exist on the south side of the Rio Grande, in the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas said Republic has expressed a willingness to enter into reciprocal relations with this Government with a view to relieving the stock interests of Texas for a fixed period of time by permitting the importation of stock into Mexico for grazing purposes only; therefore, in view of the premises, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to permit the owners of cattle in Texas who shall hereafter transport their cattle and horses into the Republic of Mexico to reimport or retransport the same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed for the protection of the revenue of the Government of the United States; and he is also authorized to make such rules and regulations with the Government of Mexico as will protect the revenue of the Government of the United States should a similar privilege for a similar period of time be asked by said Republic of Mexico for any of its citizens under like conditions as exist in the section of Texas before mentioned: Therefore

Resolved, etc., That any owner or owners of cattle in the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized to remove their herds across the Rio Grande into Mexico, for the purpose of grazing, and reintroduce them into the United States without charge for import duties, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That the same privilege above given to citizens of the United States is hereby granted to citizens of Mexico who may desire to introduce their cattle into the United States for like purpose.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall expire within twelve months from the date of its passage.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the letter.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1893.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 18th instant, with copy of H. Res. 93, "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle transporting them into Mexico to reimport same," etc., I have to state that I have examined the bill and that proper regulations can be issued by this Department to enforce the same if it shall be enacted into law.

I have to call your attention to the fact that although horses are mentioned in the first line of page 2, they do not appear to be provided for in the proposed law.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. T. M. PASCHAL,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. McMILLIN. This resolution, as it shows on its face, provides for the transportation temporarily, and reimportation, of cattle across the Rio Grande into Mexico from that portion of Texas where the cattle are famishing in consequence of a severe drought. The Secretary of the Treasury has reported that it is possible for him to adopt regulations by which any fraud or irregularity against the revenues can be prevented. The Committee on Ways and Means were unanimously of the opinion that it was not only humane, but wise and just to adopt the resolution. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PASCHAL] such time as he desires.

Mr. BURROWS. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood from the reading of the resolution that this right was to extend until the 1st day of May next; but in the closing portion of the resolution it is declared that it shall be in force for one year. I did not know but that was an oversight.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that comes in this way, that for one year the Government of Mexico would like to have similar privileges under similar circumstances, if such calamities as occasionally overtake stock-raisers on the border should afflict them. The Secretary of the Treasury was of the opinion that that was not improper.

Mr. BURROWS. While the right on our part would expire on the 1st day of May, the right on the part of Mexico would continue for one year.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to my friend that the necessity for it, so far as we are concerned, will have been exhausted by the 1st of May, for the new crop of grass comes then.

Mr. BURROWS. But the necessity would not cease, so far as the Mexican Government is concerned?

Mr. McMILLIN. I would state to my friend from Michigan that the trouble can not possibly overtake the Mexicans this year, but it might possibly next year. So we give them the privilege next year that we ask of them, temporarily, for this year.

Mr. REED. As I understand it, in order to obtain this privilege from Mexico it is necessary for us to put ourselves under reciprocal obligations, and that must apply to some future time so far as Mexico is concerned, because the necessity does not now exist in Mexico?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, because it appears that in an extensive territory south of the Rio Grande there is ample pasture this winter, and that will continue during this season; but it is possible that it might not be the situation next year, but that the circumstances might be reversed. It was thought best to make this neighborly arrangement with them. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PASCHAL] whose district is interested in this measure.

Mr. PASCHAL. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add other than has already been presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]. I only wish to say to the House that in order to appreciate the extent and the character of this drought, it will be remembered that an area of country represented by something like one hundred and odd counties has been afflicted for the past three years with a drought which even in that section of country has been unprecedented; that the winter rains have come too late to do any good so far as the pasturage is concerned; and our cattle, the chief industry of that section of Texas, are dying at the rate of thousands every week. I doubt very much whether the relief now proposed to be offered will be in time sufficient to obviate an immense loss to the people of Texas; nevertheless, it will be some relief, and save tens of thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of cattle from starvation during the present winter.

I will say, further, that the Mexican minister, upon whom I called in relation to this matter, has been pleased to extend every courtesy toward us in facilitating the carrying out of this act. He has been duly apprised of the condition of affairs in that section of Texas, and has declared that the Mexican Government will do everything in its power to enable our people to get relief under the act. I believe that no gentleman will object to the consideration of the measure at this time, because if it is deferred it will amount to the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars to our people.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I think there will be no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, there are amendments offered to the resolution so as to include horses. The insertion of the words "and horses" is recommended in the report, in the preamble, the resolution, and the title.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, was laid on the table.

HAWAII.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution looking to the investigation of questions of fact connected with the late Hawaiian revolution. I ask that it be read for information and for immediate action by the House.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to present a resolution and ask for its consideration, and the gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I demand that it be referred to the proper committee, under the rules.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the gentleman will not object to the resolution being read for information. It calls simply for an investigation of facts.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Let it be introduced and go to the proper committee.

Mr. BLAIR. It is simply to ascertain the truth, and if the House is not disposed to consider it, that is for the House. I do not desire to make any remarks upon it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Let it go to the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. REED. The gentlemen are rather shy on the Hawaiian question all the way through.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We shall not be shy when the proper time comes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not hear what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] says, but I always object to the printing of resolutions in the RECORD.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that it be read for information. It is a resolution for the investigation of a question of fact that is important.

Several members objected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1589) for the relief of Louis Pelham.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the resolution may be returned to me.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred through the desk.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Speaker permit me to ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The resolution must be referred through the desk.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall not object, because of the discourtesy that has been shown, but I ask for the reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution under the rules must be referred through the desk, and the Speaker will look at it and see to which committee it should be referred.

Mr. BLAIR. Does any gentleman object to its being referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to its introduction, except under the rules.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, then, if it may be returned to me I will introduce it under the rules. At the suggestion of a gentleman on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member (and it is a matter I have mentioned to others), I ask again for the reading of the resolution for information, and then I will ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any objection to its being read.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] objects.

Mr. RAYNER. But the gentleman from New Hampshire renews his request.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I withdraw objection to the reading of the resolution; but I object to its present consideration.

Mr. RAYNER. It is not to be up for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the resolution be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

LOUIS PELHAM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1589) for the relief of Louis Pelham.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, has this bill been reported from any committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. It has; and I ask to have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill, and also asks consent that the report be read. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. What committee reported this bill, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection so that I may make a statement explaining the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection. It is unseemly and obstructs public business. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. I am willing to hear the statement, but I do not know that it will change my mind.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I am willing that the gentleman shall object, if he desires to, after I make my statement.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I have objected, but I withdraw the objection. I do this with the distinct understanding that I, too, shall have an opportunity to speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. So far as I am concerned the gentleman is at perfect liberty to speak.

Mr. McMILLIN. No contract can be made with the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to refund money wrongfully paid out by Louis Pelham, and illegally collected from him, under certain confiscation proceedings against the property of Henry Pelham in the district court of the United States, in the State of Indiana, the sum of $3,000 having been illegally taken and collected from him by the marshal of the United States for said district court of Indiana upon the sale of a certain promissory note for $7,000, executed on the 1st day of March, 1862, due four years after date, executed by Louis Pelham to the said Henry Pelham, and sold upon a venditioni exponas under a libel of information in said district court to the said Louis Pelham, when in fact the marshal of said district had not under the mandate of the writ of monition attached the said note, nor had he seized the same, nor had it ever been in his custody from the commencement to the end of the proceedings thereon.

The said note had not been at any time within the jurisdiction of said district court, and the said note was not at the time of the sale of the same, nor at the time of paying the said sum of money to the said marshal as the purchaser thereof by the said Louis Pelham, nor at any time thereafter by the marshal of said district court delivered to him, nor did he acquire any title whatsoever to said note under said proceedings, and the said promissory note was never in the territorial limits of the said State of Indiana, but, on the contrary, was during all that time in the possession of Henry Pelham, in the State of Kentucky, where the said Henry Pelham resided.

The United States, in 1863, filed a libel of information in the district court for the district of Indiana "against the following described credits and effects of Henry Pelham, that is to say, one promissory note, dated March 1, 1862, for the sum of $7,000, and due four years after date, executed by Louis Pelham to Henry Pelham." Louis Pelham was still in Indiana and within the jurisdiction of the marshal; but Henry Pelham was in Kentucky, outside of the marshal's jurisdiction, and had the note with him there. The libel, after reciting the act of July 17, 1862, and making other proper recitals, alleged that, "by force of the said statute and the public warning of the President of the United States, the said estate, credits, and effects of him, the said Henry Pelham, so described as aforesaid, became and were forfeited to the United States; and that the same were liable to be condemned as enemy's property."

The writ of monition stated a libel had been filed by the district attorney against "one promissory note," and commanded the marshal "to attach the note and to detain the same in your custody until the further order of the court concerning the same," and "to give due notice to all persons claiming the same," etc.

The marshal made return, on the back of the writ, as follows:

MAY 2, 1863.

In obedience to the within warrant I have arrested the property within mentioned and have cited all persons having or pretending to have any right, title, or interest therein, as by the said warrant I am commanded to do.

D. G. ROSE, Marshal.

A summons was at the same time issued against Louis Pelham, the maker of the note, which was served on him by the marshal, and he appeared and answered, admitting the facts alleged in the libel.

The fact of a publication of notice to all other parties in interest was proven, and a decree of condemnation was made, and a writ of venditioni exponas issued to the marshal, who returned that he had offered for sale the promissory note and sold it to Louis Pelham for $3,000.

When the war was over Henry Pelham sued the sureties of the marshal (he being dead in the district court for the district of Kentucky, for damages alleged to have accrued by the marshal's false return in the case. The declaration alleged a false return "to a writ of monition in a libel by the United States against the described credits and effects of Henry Pelham: * * * that is to say, one promissory note for $7,000, executed by Louis Pelham to the said Henry."

It was an admitted fact in the case that the note was, from the issuing of the monition in the proceedings for confiscation till and at the time of the return to the monition by the marshal that he had arrested the same, outside the jurisdiction of the said district court and not within the territorial limits of the State of Indiana; but, on the contrary, was, during all that time, in the possession of the said plaintiff in the State of Kentucky, where he resided.

The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

If the jury find, from the evidence, that the allegations of the declaration are true, they will find for the plaintiff and assess his damages in the amount of the note, with the interest thereon from maturity.

The court refused to give this instruction and charged that, under the conceded facts in the case, the plaintiff was entitled to no more than nominal damages.

A verdict was rendered accordingly, and the refusal to charge as requested and the charge as given were then assigned to the Supreme Court of the United States for error. The Supreme Court held that to effect its seizure it was necessay for the marshal to take the note into his actual control and custody, and consequently the debt was not confiscated. (15 Wallace, page 196; 9 Wallace, page 103.)

Every principle of equity and justice, then, requires that the Government should refund the money received without consideration and for property which it did not control and had no right to sell; for "a vendor," says the Supreme Court of the United States, "is bound to know that he actually has that which he professes to sell." (Allen vs. Hammond 11. Pet., 72.)

"A court of equity," said Chief Justice Marshall, in Garnett vs. Macon, 2 Brock., 185, "considers a vendor responsible for the title he sells, and is bound to inform himself of its defects," and to make the same known to the purchaser, as the latter has a right, if no liens or incumbrances are made known to him by the vendor, to suppose himself as purchasing an estate free from incumbrance.

Where a vendor intends to sell and the vendee to purchase a subsisting title, but which in fact does not exist, a payment of the purchase money, says the Supreme Court of the United States, "would be a payment without the shadow of consideration, and no court of equity is believed ever to have sanctioned such a principle."

Claimant is, therefore, on the score of precedent as well as authority, justly and honestly entitled to a return of his money.

The proof accompanying the bill shows that Louis Pelham was an extremely loyal person.

Mr. RAYNER (interposing). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order; what is this statement about?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making a statement in connection with a bill which he desires to have considered.

Mr. RAYNER. Has he had unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. RAYNER. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The Clerk proceeded with the call. When the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called,

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report, with the recommendation that it pass, a resolution in lieu of a resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and of a resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

The Clerk read the title of the report, as follows:

House resolution relative to intervention by United States Government, its representatives, and armed forces in the affairs of the Hawaiian Government.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be printed and referred to the House Calendar, and the original resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is there a report, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. There is a report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order to read the report at this time. This is merely the reporting of a resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Maine inquired whether there was a report, and, under the rules, there must be a report.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire simply to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. A statement is not in order at this time. This is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I supposed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] was always in order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal statement.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I trust that consent will be given, and I ask the same courtesy for myself, the privilege of making known the contents of the resolution that I presented awhile ago.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. No statement is in order pending the call of committees for reports. The Clerk will resume the call.

The Clerk resumed the call.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. No question of order can be raised pending the call of committes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have made a report, and I desire to ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. There can be no consent given during this call.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then what is the proper time to ask consent that the minority may have leave to submit their views?

The SPEAKER. This is the call of committees for reports, and it can not be interrupted.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. But the minority desire to submit their views.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the views of the minority may be filed and printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAIR. I object to everything——[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will resume the call.

The Clerk resumed the call of committees, which was continued until the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was reached.

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I tried to get the Chair's attention to a great mistake that has been made here. My privileges have been invaded. This is a privileged resolution; and the Speaker has sent it to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Surely the Speaker will not send this privileged resolution to the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request the gentleman from Maine to take his seat. The gentleman will resume his seat.

Mr. REED. The point I desire——

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will resume their seats. [A pause.] The rules require that the Chair shall call the committees for reports; and during that call no debate is in order of any kind or character.

Mr. REED. I do not propose to debate——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. REED. I simply desire to know as a parliamentary question whether the reference of this report to the Calendar causes it to lose its privilege; and if it does, I desire to make the point of order that it can not be referred to the Calendar in such a way that it will lose its privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly the point to which I tried to call the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That question may arise at a later period. The gentleman from Maine, of course, is well acquainted with the rule or the practice that the reporting of a resolution during the call of committees for reports and its reference to the Calendar, ordinarily takes away its privilege. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. REED. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Where is the privilege, Mr. Speaker? The Speaker ruled that this was a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very plain. Even a privileged matter may lose its privilege by being reported during the call of committees for reports; and that merely emphasizes the propriety of the rule, that during the call of committees for reports no debate is in order and no suggestion is in order as to debate.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to make any suggestion or indulge in any debate. I simply desire to have this thing proceed, as I consider it, in order. I can not believe it to be possible that a privileged question, which concerns the House, can be deprived of its privilege by a committee choosing to report it during the hour for reports of committees; and either this reference of the resolution to the Calendar must leave it there with its privilege and its right to be called up, or else it can not be sent there. A question of privilege in its very nature is one which the House stops all other proceedings to consider. That is what makes it a question of privilege. All other business is stopped, because the question of privilege concerns the very existence of the House—its privileges and its right to proceed with business. That is what makes a question of privilege.

Now, the House can not be deprived of its privilege to examine this thing at once by any action on the part of any one of its committees. The House may refer it to the Calendar after it has been reported; but the matter can not be referred arbitrarily—I did not mean to use the word "arbitrarily" in any offensive sense, but it can not be referred to the Calendar except by the action of the House, because it is a question of privilege. That is my view of the matter.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair will recall that he ruled specifically that this was a question of privilege; and by the action of the Chair (if the Speaker will permit me) this was taken out of the possession of the House and referred to a committee.

Now, the Speaker will kindly permit me to offer this suggestion: If the present action is correct, he will readily see that it will be absolutely impossible for any privilege of the House to be exercised if the Speaker in his own person should see fit to prevent it; for even if a resolution of impeachment were brought before the House, the Speaker could refer that question of privilege to a committee; and if the committee, by exercising some technical right of reporting at a certain hour of the day, can send the resolution to the Calendar, where it can never be reached, the privilege is absolutely gone, and the power of the Speaker is absolutely interposed between the Constitution of the United States and the rights of this body in the exercise of its highest prerogative, that of impeaching the President. It can not be possible, it seems to me, that the Chair is correct in the position he has taken.

The SPEAKER (referring to the Digest). The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the rule in one moment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no desire, of course, to embarrass the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is no embarrassment about it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I hope the Chair will take ample time to examine the matter, so that there may be no mistake.

The SPEAKER. This matter has been decided so often that there is no question about it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only want to reserve my rights.

The SPEAKER. At the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, as will be seen by reference to the RECORD, page 7641, it was held that—

A privileged proposition, if reported during the morning hour for reports, loses its privilege and takes its place on the Calendar.

That has been the uniform ruling in the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I objected to that procedure for the very reason that it should not jeopardize the privileged character of this resolution because it was reported at such a time.

Mr. REED. That is not a loss of the privileges, however, of the House. It manifestly refers to the fact that the committee may lose its privilege in making the report in that way, but not the House.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The committees were being called for reports at the time this was filed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair will see, I trust, that under the ruling none of my rights are lost, this being a question of privilege, as the Chair himself has heretofore held.

The SPEAKER. But undoubtedly the Committee on Foreign Affairs had the right to make the report; and what the effect may be will be determined when an effort is made to call the matter up.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only desire to leave the matter in such way that my rights and privileges can not be foreclosed.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman loses no rights, for he has none now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, I understood the Speaker to rule specifically that my resolution was privileged. That being the case——

The SPEAKER. The Chair so held.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That being the case, it certainly carries with it some right.

The SPEAKER. What right has the minority of a committee to object to the filing of a report by the committee?

Mr. BOUTELLE. But it is the right of this House to determine whether it is a privileged question or not.

The SPEAKER. That comes up when the matter is called up for consideration.

The Clerk will resume the call of committees for reports.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS, NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. CADMUS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the House resolution of October 2, 1893, directing an inquiry as to the public buildings and grounds in New York City; which was referred to the House Calendar.

The remainder of the committees were called, there being no further reports.

GEN. GEORGE S. GREENE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes before 1 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs, which was passed over on the Calendar yesterday with the privilege of returning to it to-day.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4416) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. George S. Greene.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

Mr. BOUTELLE (to Mr. BLAIR). I would not object to that.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand there is objection to the consideration of this bill in the House.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read before consent is given.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made.

Mr. BLAIR. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. KILGORE. Let it be considered in the committee in the proper way.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. OATES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. George S. Greene, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battle, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint George S. Greene, late brigadier and brevet major general United States Volunteers, to the rank of first lieutenant of artillery in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list of the Army as of that grade, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said George S. Greene, but this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of said George S. Greene may have after his decease.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that the beneficiary thereof shall be placed upon the retired list as a first lieutenant of artillery.

Maj. Gen. Greene is entitled to this consideration from the American Congress for his long and distinguished services in behalf of his country. He entered the Military Academy in 1819, and is now 92 years of age. His services were continuous in the Army until June 30, 1836, when he resigned after a gallant and meritorious career. In January, 1862, he reëntered the service of his country as a colonel of volunteers. He was subsequently a brigadier general, and was appointed major general (by brevet) in 1865 for gallant and meritorious services, and honorably discharged April 30, 1866.

It appears by the military record that at the time of the breaking out of the civil war he was 60 years of age, and notwithstanding that fact, he abandoned a lucrative position to take up arms in the defense of his country, and served with honor and distinction continuously, for a period of more than five years, until after the close of the rebellion.

I have nothing further to say

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman to allow me five minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] concludes, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] to say that the beneficiary of this bill was disabled in the service of the Government?

Mr. COGSWELL. He was severely wounded.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can not say he was wholly disabled, but he was severely wounded in the service.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] if a common soldier who happened to have been wounded, but who was not disabled, would be entitled to even $12 a month under similar circumstances?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He certainly would be, and as to the common soldier who at 60 years of age, far beyond the period when he could have been required by law to enter into the service, who had entered into the Army under such circumstances as Gen. Greene did, giving up a lucrative business, losing his all, I should feel like doing something more for him than is done for the common soldier ordinarily.

Mr. BAILEY. But the question is this: As I understand, the proposition is to put this man on the retired list under conditions such as would not justify the granting of a pension under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, no; I stated that he was wounded——

Mr. BAILEY. But he must be disabled.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He must be disabled to a certain degree.

Mr. BAILEY. And the gentleman does not say the beneficiary of the bill is disabled from the wound he received in the service of the Government.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is he drawing a pension now?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He is drawing a pension.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How much?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do you propose to put him on the retired list in addition to that.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; he loses his pension.

Mr. HOLMAN. At what do you place him on the retired list?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As a lieutenant. He was a major-general, and it is proposed to put him on the retired list as a first lieutenant, at the advanced age of 92 years. It is possible he may live a year or two longer.

Mr. McMILLIN. The principle is the same whether he lives one year or ten.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, the principle is not the same. Besides, it would make a great deal of difference as to the amount of expenditure, as to the pay, between a man of 40 years of age and a man 92 years of age, as this gentleman is now.

Mr. McMILLIN. You comment upon the amount involved.

Mr. BLANCHARD. You say he will lose his pension?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He will yield up his pension.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the bill so provide.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The general law says so, and——

Mr. BLAND. The bill says so.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, this bill says so.

Mr. BRYAN. What has this man been doing since 1866?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He has been trying to make a living in various ways.

Mr. BRYAN. What are the precedents? Are we in the habit of restoring men to the rolls after twenty or thirty years' absence?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Very few instances of that kind occur. In every Congress for some years past some gentlemen have been restored to the Army and put upon the retired list, where there were peculiar circumstances of merit and distinction, and perhaps distress, accompanying their cases.

Mr. BRYAN. I had a man in Nebraska ask me to have that very same thing done, and I wanted to know whether there were any precedents for putting a man back on the roll after thirty years.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. There are plenty of precedents. Gen. Averill was placed upon the retired list.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Every Congress has passed some bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. What will be the increased pay which this officer will receive?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Three-fourths of the full pay of a first lieutenant.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] has presented the statement of the distinguished services of this beneficiary, already a recipient of the Government's bounty, and has mentioned his great age. Does he not think it a safer rule to increase the pension in meritorious cases, and put it on the ground of disability, than to take a man from private life, after having spent years in trying to better his condition, out of his country's service, when he gets too old to work on the outside, and in that way make up a special list of governmental beneficiaries, by which we will ultimately have two classes, one of taxpayers and the other of tax-eaters?

Now, does not the gentleman think that the line of the pension system we have adopted had better be pursued than that this retired list be enormously increased?

Mr. COOMBS. I call attention to the fact that this additional expense of the Government because of pension would naturally succeed to his wife.

Mr. McMILLIN. The widow does not succeed to Congressional pensions. The gentleman is in error in that.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. In answer to one of the questions of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will state that I am not on the Committee on Pensions. This bill was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee have considered it and reported it unanimously. The second question by the gentleman from Tennessee is whether it would not be better to curtail our long line of pensioners, and so forth.

Mr. McMILLIN. Our long line of retired officers in private life.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs has been extremely guarded in such cases. Perhaps seventy or eighty bills were referred to that committee during the last Congress. I do not think a dozen of them were reported. I recollect but two of them passing the House.

I appeal to the patriotism of this House; I appeal to its high sense of justice to give this bill favorable action. Gen. Greene served his country more years than the average years of the membership of this House. He was, in one sense of the words, forty-six years in the service of his country. He served it through the last great war. He quit at a time when it was difficult for a man of his character and ability to find employment at a salary commensurate with that which he would have received if he had remained in the Army. He did not quit for his own benefit simply. He left the Army because he felt that his services were no longer needed, and that, if he remained in it, he would be to some extent, though still a tolerably hale man for 66 years of age, a pensioner upon the country. He has now come here through his Representative in Congress and asks what seems to me to be a very slight recognition of his services—that he be put upon the retired list as a lieutenant.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Would his widow be entitled to a higher pension as widow of a lieutenant than now, if he should die?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I believe his widow might be entitled to a higher pension as the widow of a lieutenant, but can not say positively.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think so. I know she would not.

Mr. BINGHAM. She would not.

A MEMBER. Would not his widow have a right to a pension?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not where it is a special act.

Mr. McMILLIN. Not where Congress has granted a pension.

Mr. BINGHAM. If it is a special act, the pension dies with the beneficiary.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the pay of a first lieutenant?

Mr. BINGHAM. About $1,800 a year.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And he would get two-thirds of that?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He is 92 years of age. He could not get that more than a year or two.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But the principle is the thing to be considered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There are certainly some exceptions to all principles.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It would be a great deal better to increase his pension.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS].

Mr. COOMBS. I only want to say, gentlemen of the House, that I have been waited upon in relation to this case for two or three years. Maj. Gen. Slocum, who is thoroughly acquainted with this case, is very much interested in seeing that this man receives this benefit from Congress. He knows the whole circumstances of the case. He came on to Washington in relation to it. He thinks that this is a case which should be made an exception from the general rule; and for one I shall vote most heartily in favor of it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will now move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to be heard on this bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BAILEY. Only a few minutes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield the gentleman whatever time he needs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed on principle to all legislation of this kind. I believe now, as I have always believed, that when any man becomes disabled in the service of the Government, it ought to make a fair and reasonable provision for him. In order to do that there has existed from the foundation of the Government a pension roll, and all men who in our service have become less able to serve themselves and their families have very properly found a place on that pension roll. I heartily concur in the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], that if there is a peculiar merit in the claim of this applicant, the pension roll, on which he now finds a place, is the proper method to extend whatever relief Congress may see fit to grant him.

This retired list is an outgrowth of the war. For over seventy years this Government existed without such a list. It fought three foreign wars. It fought the war of the Revolution, it fought and won the war of 1812, it fought the Indian wars, and then it fought the war with Mexico, in which it added a splendid empire to the Republic; and in all that more than seventy years it never entered the brain of any living man to establish a privileged class of idlers to eat up the taxes which other men had earned.

But during the civil war this retired list was established. It was inaugurated originally to meet a peculiar condition. At the beginning of the war there were many men engaged in the military service who by reason of their age were unsuitable for their commands, and this law was intended to retire them. Since that time the system has been developed and developed and exception after exception ingrafted upon it, until to-day the people of the United States are paying more than three millions annually for the support of those who are better able to support their neighbors than their neighbors are to support them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, they not only retire the officer and give him 75 per cent of the salary to which he would be entitled if in active service, but then they have a provision under which they add a longevity fee of 10 per cent for each five years that he has served, and that longevity fee may reach as much as 40 per cent. Therefore when the officer first begins his work he receives a dollar, and when he plays he receives $1.15!

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman forgets that that longevity increase is provided for officers on the active list, and that they receive it while on the active list.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It does not apply to this case at all.

Mr. BAILEY. It is added to their pay when in active service, and then they are retired with it as a part of their retired pay. This Government ought to pay to every man in its service every dollar that his services are worth, and having so paid him it is under no further obligation to him. Our army and navy officers are the only men in this country that the Government educates and pays them for the privilege of educating them, pays them for every day which they serve it, and then allows them to retire and continue to draw money from the public Treasury.

Their current salary is a fair equivalent for their service, and they ought to be required to exercise the prudence that other men are compelled to exercise, and save something while they work, or pay the penalty of their improvidence. The taxpayer himself, the most useful man in all the country, for it is his labor that supports all others, if he does not save something out of his earnings, is compelled to suffer the consequences of his folly. But the army or navy officer who is educated at a Government institution and paid for every day he serves, can waste like a spendthrift and feel that when his money is all gone the Government will take care of him in his old age.

I have introduced a bill to repeal the law establishing the retired list. That bill has gone to the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is chairman. If he would report it back or even amend the law so that no man could go upon the retired list unless he were disabled and indigent, then he might successfully appeal to the sense of justice, always residing in this House, to do a benefaction in a worthy case. But so long as the retired list continues to be a receptacle for men who have been educated by the Government, who have been paid for their work, and who are permitted to go upon that list, though rich and in perfect health, so long I shall protest with all the power that I possess against adding another name to it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If this man had remained in the Army but a few years longer he would have been retired as a major-general with an income of $5,500.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why did not he remain?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Because the war had ended, and he thought there was no longer any pressing necessity for his service.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, that simply illustrates how this kind of legislation debauches public sentiment. This man retired at that time, but no man in this day thinks of retiring. They continue to draw the money of the Government because they have been taught that it is right.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel called upon at this time to enter upon a discussion of the general question of the retired list.

If there were no retired list I should feel just as zealous in favor of the passage of this bill as I do now. Upon such a question as this I do not consider whether there is a retired list or not. There were days in which republics thought they were doing themselves honor to take liberal action for the benefit of their heroes; and I am surprised that in an American Congress there should be any hesitation in recognizing patriotic services such as those of Gen. Greene. [Applause.]

I am surprised that gentlemen should cavil over the pittance that it is proposed to give this distinguished man—a man who, when he had passed the age at which men could be compelled to enter military service, returned voluntarily to the field at 60 years of age, and continued there until he believed that his country had no longer any pressing need for his services; and then went out into the world to engage in its struggles, unfitted in some degree by the hardships of military life for competing with others in vocations of civil life. Broken in health and fortune now, at the advanced age—not of three score and ten, but of four score and ten and two—this proposition is made in his behalf to grant him the honor of dying in the Army with rank and pay of a lieutenant, and I must appeal to members of the American Congress to do themselves the honor of voting for the passage of such a bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, the impassioned appeal made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] in behalf——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas rise for the purpose of opposing this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I do.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILGORE. I suppose I would have the right to speak upon the question——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly; but I would prefer the gentleman should speak in my time, if he has no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I do not make any demand on the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not consider that the gentleman is making any demand on me: but I cheerfully yield him such time as he may desire, only trusting that he will not occupy so much as to prevent a vote upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, the impassioned appeal which the gentleman from Ohio has made in behalf of the beneficiary in this bill might have been somewhat modified if he had stated that Gen. Greene is already receiving the bounty of the Government in the way of a pension at the rate of $30 per month, and I would not be unwilling, if it is found upon investigation that $30 a month is insufficient for his purposes, to see the amount increased by enlarging his pension.

But I am opposed to an enlargement of the retired list. Mr. Chairman, the law has fixed the limit to that list; and every time Congress passes a special bill to put some one on the retired list the law now in force upon that subject must be amended and the retired list enlarged. I am opposed to that. I do not think such a proposition ought to be urged. It has been stated, I believe, by every gentleman who has opposed this proposition that he would be willing to see this old gentleman taken care of by giving him a proper pension.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, $30 a month is not a sum to be "sneezed at." In our country it is regarded as a very fair salary. Many of our people earn only $10 or $12 a month: and numbers of them went into the late war and fought it through. It is true they were on the "off side" in that war, and now they enjoy the privilege of paying their share of the expenses incurred by just such legislation as this bill proposes. They think they are doing very well if they earn $10, $12, or $15 a month. Now this gentleman can not have much of a family on his hands; because if he is as old as they say he can not have accumulated any family to have amounted to anything since the war: and it would seem that he would be abundantly able to take care of himself on the $30 a month which the Government now allows him.

But, Mr. Chairman, pretermitting all such considerations, I say if this is a meritorious case considered with reference to an increase of pension, and if $30 a month is not sufficient to provide for this old man in the last days he is to spend on earth, let his pension be enlarged in a proper way. But let us not come in here and violate the principle which has fixed a limit upon the retired list; let us not pass, almost every day Congress is in session, these special acts the purpose of which is to enlarge that list. I can not concur in any such proposition. The gentleman from Ohio came very near seducing me into an agreement not to obstruct the passage of this bill; but the more I think of it, and the more I talk about it, and the more I hear about it on both sides of the question, the more I am inclined to obstruct the passage of this measure, or at least to use it for the profitable purpose of consuming the morning hour.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, Gen. George S. Greene, whom the bill under consideration proposes to place on the retired list, graduated at the Military Academy in 1821. He remained in the Army until 1836, when Congress made provision for the resignation of army officers who might see fit to leave the service because of the superabundance of officers. Acting upon that suggestion of Congress Gen. Greene tendered his resignation and went into civil life.

When the war of 1861 broke out he was occupying a position on the public works in the city of New York, which he had long held, and in which position he had a higher salary than was subsequently paid him as colonel of the regiment of which he took command. That regiment was organized in my own county, and I introduced this bill because of the relationship which we in St. Lawrence County hold toward this distinguished officer. He remained in the Army till the close of the war, having been twice promoted for distinguished services.

The House listened with very great interest the other day to the gentleman from Alabama, now occupying the chair, when he described a contest that he had witnessed where a prominent part was taken by a very distinguished citizen by adoption of the State of Illinois (Gen. Shields). I believe the same gentleman was present on another occasion, and he may or may not have known who it was that, with one brigade, held Culp's Hill at Gettysburg during one of the most important periods in that great battle. It was Gen. Greene. When the line was denuded of men to occupy some other threatened point Gen. Greene held this position, though constantly engaged, until the end of the conflict.

He was seriously wounded and has suffered ever since from the injury there received; and while he is a man of great physical vigor and robust constitution—indeed he must be to have gone through the hardship he has endured and be alive; his ninety-second birthday occurred last May—he is not able to earn a livelihood in his profession, a civil engineer, and $360 a year, the pension he now receives, is not ample for the support of himself and wife. This appeal is made to the justice and generosity of Congress to do for Gen. Greene what it has done for other venerable and highly distinguished officers since the adoption of the system of placing them upon the retired list. We ask to put Gen. Greene on that list. It will increase the expenditures not more than ten or twelve hundred dollars a year above what is now paid.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman what arm of the service Gen. Greene served in?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think he was in the Engineer Corps.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why, then, do you propose to give him the rank of a lieutenant of artillery rather than a lieutenant of engineers?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. When the bill was under discussion amongst his friends it was first proposed to give Gen. Greene the rank of lieutenant of engineers, but it was suggested that the artillery is the branch of the service in which these retired officers are usually placed, and although his pay would be less in the artillery service than in that of the engineers, in order to comply with the uniform custom heretofore adopted by Congress it was deemed advisable to place Gen. Greene on the retired list as first lieutenant of artillery.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably.

The question was taken, and on a division, demanded by Mr. BAILEY, there were—ayes 80, noes 21.

Mr. BAILEY. No quorum.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is evident that there is no quorum present. If the gentleman insists on defeating the bill in this way I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

There being no objection, the bill was withdrawn.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4416, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MARSHALL, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution relative to providing for a joint committee, to be composed of three Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives, to examine into and report as to the condition of the Nicaragua Maritime Canal to Congress; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home.

A bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes.

A bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiences in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

BOARD OF REVIEW, WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 199) to authorize the Secretary of War to appoint a board of review in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint a board of review, to consist of three members and a recorder, from officers of the Army on the active or retired list, to review the proceedings, findings, and sentence of any court-martial for the trial of a commissioned officer or enlisted man, either of the regular Army or volunteer forces, where the accused has been dishonorably discharged from the military service of the United States, or to review the proceedings, findings, and decision of a retiring board, when an officer has been wholly retired from the Army.

SEC. 2. That the said board of review shall have jurisdiction of all such cases as shall be ordered before it by the Secretary of War, and its members shall serve without compensation, except such as they are now receiving, and may be relieved from time to time as the exigencies of the service may require: Provided, That when officers of the retired list serve upon such board they shall receive the same pay as officers of their grade upon the active list.

SEC. 3. That it shall be lawful for said board of review to hear and consider any additional evidence in each case as may properly be brought before it, under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of War, and it is hereby authorized to subpœna witnesses and to administer oaths when necessary; and the proceedings and findings, with the recommendations of said board, shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War for his consideration and action: Provided, That the Government shall be put to no expense on account of witnesses summoned on the part of the applicant.

SEC. 4. That the board shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to make them testify, and punish for contempt.

SEC. 5. That the recorder shall act as judge-advocate and be empowered to introduce witnesses to contradict the evidence of the applicant.

SEC. 6. That in case of disagreement of the board the views may be expressed in both majority and minority reports.

SEC. 7. That in all cases where the relief prayed for is recommended by the said board of review, in whole or in part, and approved by the Secretary of War, it shall be his duty to refer to Congress, for such action as it may deem proper, the findings of the board of review, together with the evidence upon which the findings are based, and he shall also report to Congress what action by Congress is deemed by him as necessary in order that justice may be done in the case: Provided, That no right to any pay or allowances shall accrue or be revived from such amendment of the records in any case.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this bill is precisely the same bill which passed this House during the last Congress. Its purpose is to do justice to officers who have been dismissed from the Army pursuant to the proceedings of courts-martial, in which the records prove that these officers have been unjustly dealt with by the court.

The history of this and of all governments has shown that in times of war—in times of excitement, great wrong and gross injustice have too frequently been done to very brave and meritorious men. The purpose of this bill is to create a court to which such persons may appeal, and have their cases reviewed with calm and proper consideration. A military court is the only court in the civilized world of original jurisdiction of a penal nature from which the person tried has no appeal to a higher tribunal to correct errors which have been inflicted upon him by what may have been a partisan or prejudiced court.

Mr. CULBERSON. Has he not an appeal to the President?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. An appeal to the President or to the ruling power in any country has been shown not to attain the purpose, because in very many instances the court is ordered by the ruling power and packed to do the very wrong and injustice to which I have referred and which the court proposed by this bill can correct. Mr. Cleveland, in one of his messages said:

If some of the proceedings of courts-martial which I have had occasion to examine present the ideas of justice which generally prevail in these tribunals, I am satisfied that they should be much reformed if the honor and honesty of the Army and Navy are by their instrumentality to be vindicated and protected.

My friend from Texas, whom I very highly esteem, will recall that we found it necessary in the Forty-seventh Congress to pass a law allowing the reference of claims to the Court of Claims, because committees of Congress had those claims presented to them on ex parte evidence, and they therefore found themselves sometimes acting favorably upon claims that were unjust and neglecting to favorably report on claims which should have received their favorable consideration. Now, the purpose of this bill is to create a court to attain the same end. I have had the honor to be upon the Military Committee of the House for a number of years. We have had a great many bills referred to us to correct supposed unjust findings of military courts. We were compelled to act upon the evidence placed before us, and in some cases we have afterward ascertained that injustice had been done either by favorably reporting cases which were not meritorious, or by reporting unfavorably on cases which upon further investigation appeared to have merit.

This bill provides that no expense or very little expense shall be incurred by the Government. It simply gives an honorable man, who has been the victim of disgrace by a partisan or mistaken court, the right to have the record reviewed, and have a report on the case sent to the Secretary of War, so that he may transmit it to Congress and give this body an opportunity to adjudicate the case, according to right and justice.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; most certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman says this will put the Government to no expense. I would suggest to him that the bill provides that whereas Army officers receive three-fourths pay when they are on the retired list ordinarily, yet when they perform services on this board, they are increased to their full pay.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would be willing to have the gentleman move to strike that out.

Mr. McMILLIN. In addition to that I find that, whereas the Government is not responsible or liable for the fees of witnesses of the party who seeks the relief, yet, suppose the Government desires to rebut that testimony, then the Government would have to pay its own witnesses.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But they would probably be military officers, and would not subject the Government to expense.

Mr. McMILLIN. Not necessarily. Any witness might be called. Then, instead of this being a board of appeals, it tries the case de novo. You are entitled to bring new evidence before it. It seems to me that the proceedings will be interminable. It is not really a board of review, it is a board of retrial.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what it is.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We can hardly say that the proposed proceeding is a retrial. The proposed board of review does not render a verdict. It only reviews the case and reports the facts to the Secretary of War; but where an injustice has been done, should there not be a new trial?

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, if it is a board of retrial, call it that; but do not call it a board of review.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is immaterial what you call it. The only purpose is to do justice, and to protect the Government from being imposed upon as it has been by cases being brought before Congress and acted upon favorably when the reverse action should have been taken. This will protect the Government in such cases, and will save ten times the amount that it will possibly cost, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. CULBERSON. Has the gentleman in mind any case in which a court-martial and the President have done injustice?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will cite a case, and call the gentleman to testify to it, the Madison Cutts case.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, and also the case of Fitz John Porter.

Mr. CULBERSON. That has been corrected.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In that case the matter was acted upon fifteen years afterwards. We propose by this means to give an opportunity to have justice done to others who have been treated in the same unjust manner. I regret to say that I have examined records which show very gross acts of injustice, and in many cases unquestioned proof has developed that officers have been improperly tried and condemned by methods which are not disclosed by the record.

One case I recall in which an officer was tried at a time and place when the court knew he could not have the benefit of evidence which was essential and possibly conclusive.

I recall another case which occurred soon after the war where the accused was not present at the pretended trial, and this fact was not disclosed by the record.

Mr. Cleveland has examined a variety of cases where injustice has been done, and there is always danger of injustice when courts of original jurisdiction are exempt from review by appellate tribunals.

The experience of the world has developed that appellate courts have had a very salutary effect over inferior courts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss the matter any further. This is in the line of economy and in the line of justice. It imposes upon the Government the very first and most important duty, to protect the honor of men who have risked their lives in its defense.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama indicate how it economizes anything? He says that it is in the line of economy.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If the gentleman had been on the Committee on Military Affairs as long as I have he would understand it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am asking you for information.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. As the chairman said, some hundred cases were referred to that committee last Congress. It required a vast amount of investigation by that committee, and that committee will be relieved if these cases are referred to a court of this character. Its time can then be devoted to other important matters.

Mr. BAILEY. Does it cost the Government anything for that committee to investigate them?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It costs the Government a great deal, and takes up time that ought to be devoted to other business. Under this bill nothing will be considered by that committee until the Secretary of War has ordered a case before the court and this court has reported favorably or unfavorably to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand it may save time to the committee, but do not see how it will save any money.

Mr. McMILLIN. And then my friend from Alabama drifts into one error concerning it. Congress will have power over these matters. Members may introduce bills concerning them, have them referred to the committee, and ask for action upon them, notwithstanding this board, independently of it, and above and beyond it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. With this board Congress never would act upon a case until it had been referred to that board, and it had come back with the stamp of the Secretary of War and the report of this board.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] speaks about cost. It costs money to consider the hundreds of cases which are referred to the committees of the House and Senate, and it costs honor, which is of more value than money for the Government to adhere to a system which often does injustice to its servants.

The commander of the Army, Gen. Schofield, says that—> the principal objection urged by the Judge-Advocate-General constitutes the strongest reason why such a measure should be adopted, namely, the present well-established principle "that a sentence of court-martial once duly executed can not be revised, reopened, set aside, or otherwise nullified." It is necessary, in my judgment, to make some legislative modification of this rule of action. It is, I believe, universally admitted that in our past history great injustice has sometimes been done through the operation of this "summary system of discipline which has governed the Army in distinction from the civil state."

> For the purposes of discipline, especially in time of war, it is undoubtedly requisite that military punishment shall be certain, military orders conclusive and effectual, at least for the time being, but it does not follow that the interests of the military service forbid that when the military necessity has passed, wrongs that may have been hastily done under the necessity of war shall be righted. On the contrary, I think the best interests of the military service, as well as all other considerations, demand that when it becomes possible all such wrongs shall be righted as far as may be practicable. It may not be necessary, or at all events as necessary, that such measure shall be applicable to courts-martial that have been held in time of peace; yet there are many instances in which Congress has thought it necessary, after a long and patient investigation, to reverse, or in some way amend the action of such courts, and I presume this measure is intended, in part at least, to relieve committees of Congress from the performance of that difficult and onerous duty, and to provide for its performance in a more satisfactory manner.
> But the more important purpose of this measure, as I understand, is to provide for such correction as may remain possible of errors hastily committed in time of war, when passion is raised to the highest pitch, when time is precious, and when full evidence is often unobtainable, in which cases great injustice may be done to meritorious soldiers.

Thus it will be seen that the Commanding General of the Army fully commends the bill. The Secretary of War in a letter says:

> If the action of courts-martial are to be reviewed and reversed or confirmed, it would be better, doubtless, on general principles and in practice that it should be done by a court of appellate jurisdiction. But it is understood that the object of the bill is to relieve Congress of numerous investigations involving the action of courts-martial. It is possible that a board, such as the bill contemplates, can better hear the testimony and examine into all the facts than a committee of either House of Congress, especially as such a board can meet at any convenient time and place. It is not understood that the design of the bill is to give the board authority to modify the sentences of courts-martial, but that its duty will be simply to examine into and report the facts and make recommendations to the Secretary of War, and that the acts of the Secretary of War will be confined simply to an approval or disapproval of the report of the board and a recommendation to Congress.
> In this view of the objects of the bill there does not seem to be any very serious objection, except it imposes upon the War Department additional duties, but it may be better for the service in that Congress will be better advised and can act more intelligently upon cases of this nature.

Referring to the remarks of the Major-General Commanding the Army, the recommendation that the board be ordered by the President, instead of by the Secretary of War, is not concurred in. The distinction is quite unnecessary, inasmuch as all boards as well as courts-martial are actually ordered by the Secretary of War, whether they are said to be done by direction of the President or not. But if done by direction of the President, precedent will require that the reports and recommendations be referred to him for his action. This will unnecessarily impose upon him additional and onerous duties and require the President in advance to recommend or not recommend to Congress the passage of laws relieving the individuals whose cases have been investigated. Should Congress afterwards pass bills of relief, the whole subject will come before the President on the question of approving the bills, so that no sentence of a court-martial can be changed or modified without the ultimate approval of the President. Congress may perhaps justly relieve itself by placing the burden of investigation upon the War Department, but it ought not to relieve itself by imposing additional burdens upon the President.

Now, I do hope, in the line of economy, in the line of justice, in the line of good military administration, and in the line of propriety, that this bill will pass.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I supported this bill in committee and I propose to support it in the House upon some of the grounds advanced by the gentleman from Alabama, chiefly, however, upon the ground that the time of the Committee on Military Affairs will be economized. Now, we members on that committee are of the opinion that our time is valuable, and think that we could devote it to something more important to the Government than hearings upon private bills. We could devote it to the consideration of the expenditures of the Army, to its welfare and reorganization, and perhaps the reduction of the cost of the Army, as well as to the general purposes for which money is expended for military purposes. But as it is, each time the committee meets it is presented with a number of private bills.

The committee does not seek them nor desire them to be sent to it. Gentlemen who claimed to have been wronged by courts-martial and retiring boards approach Congress through their representatives and otherwise, and present these bills. They come up on a presentation which upon its face very often shows no cause for consideration; but the papers must be examined to reach that conclusion. They come, again, very often showing some of the most startling and astounding transactions and sometimes showing that the grossest injustice has been done. Now, that is the first presentation. Shall we take the ex parte presentation made on behalf of the beneficiary, or shall we attempt to investigate in some way the whole case? You can readily see if we attempt to investigate so as to do justice to the claimant and also protect the Government, we must devote a considerable portion of our time.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Three or four weeks in one case.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This committee sits as nearly continuously as any other committee of the House, except the general Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand this is a proposition to organize a court or commission, and to give the people who are to have the benefits of its investigation a cause of action in that court?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman is mistaken if he understands that. The first proposition is that anyone seeking admission to this court must first lay his case before the Secretary of War. Now, why is that proposition inserted? Because it is found, in the claims of these officers or soldiers or enlisted men, they insist that the greatest injustice has been done them; that it passed through the War Department perfunctorily; that an indorsement was made by the Secretary of War on the investigation, relying upon some clerk; that it passed on to the President, and perhaps the President simply indorsed the indorsement of the Secretary of War; so the sentence of a court-martial, arbitrary and cruel, is indorsed, and the officer is made to suffer. Then the officer comes to Congress, and one-half of the time of the two Committees on Military Affairs is taken up in the investigation of such cases as this.

To do justice to a citizen is not a small thing. A citizen complains that his Government has outraged him. He goes to the representatives of the people and says, "Let me have an investigation. You are the only power to which I can appeal." There is no power in the law authorizing the President; there is no power in the law authorizing the General of the Army; there is no power in the law authorizing the Secretary of War to review this matter. Injustice has been done. Now, let him go to the Secretary of War and present his case anew; and if he sees that he can sustain his position to such an extent that a reinvestigation should be had, then he will order a court composed of officers of the Army, so that the expense is not material, except the loss of time to those officers from the other duties which they might perform.

This court investigates it, this court calls his witnesses, whom he must bring before it at his own expense. When his side of the case is investigated the court takes up the Government side of the case, and that court is able to get testimony that this committee is never able to reach.

Mr. KILGORE. At last, then, the purpose is to create a court in which a man who deems himself wronged by the judgment of a court-martial can have the matter reviewed?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes; and what objection is there to that, there being no such court in existence?

Mr. KILGORE. And it requires the preliminary action of the Secretary of War to let him in?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It does.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, everybody against whom a court-martial pronounces judgment feels that he has been outraged, does he not?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir; not everybody.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, most men.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; I do not think the gentleman is correct in saying "most men," but a fair proportion of them do. After this court has investigated it makes its report and sends that report to Congress, with all the proceedings spread out before us, so that the Committee on Military Affairs need not further investigate the matter. My chief object in urging this bill is to avoid the continual pressure for time and opportunity to be heard before the Committee on Military Affairs upon these special bills.

Mr. BAILEY. I think there is a good deal of force in that suggestion. I ask the gentleman if he will agree to strike out of the bill that part of it which relates to reviewing the findings of the retiring board?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Let me say that that is the most important part of the bill, because the retiring board is a star-chamber, where the officer has no opportunity to present his case.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will state to the gentleman from Texas, who may not be as familiar as I am with this subject—I certainly did not understand it until I had occasion to investigate it—that officers often complain when they are retired wholly, and this is intended to provide for a review of the action of the retiring board. Sometimes officers are retired without desiring to be retired; sometimes they are retired to make places for other officers——

Mr. BAILEY. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And they do not want to be retired in that way without an opportunity to have their cases investigated.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will this bill correct that?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. To a great extent it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The morning hour has expired.

On motion the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 199 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 353) for the admission of New Mexico as a State.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, before that question is put, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I want to see if we can not come to an agreement. I will ask the gentleman if there is any objection to including Oklahoma at the same time, as I understand that his committee has proposed to do?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. This proceeding is pursuant to a special order of the House, which can not be amended except by being referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. It can be amended by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 4.

Mr. HICKS. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. One moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. The point is made that no quorum has voted, and the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, pending this vote I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] be agreed to, and that, as soon as that bill is disposed of, the House take up and consider the bill on the Calendar for the admission of Oklahoma.

Mr. HICKS. I object to that.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman object to Oklahoma coming in?

Mr. HICKS. No, sir; I am in favor of the admission of Oklahoma, and also of New Mexico.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit another request for unanimous consent. I ask consent that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the New Mexico bill be now agreed to, and that the bill for the admission of Oklahoma be included in the present special order as in the first instance.

Mr. DINGLEY. So that the Oklahoma bill shall be a continuing order under the same restrictions as the New Mexico bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; and that as soon as this New Mexico bill is disposed of the special order under which we are operating shall apply to the Oklahoma bill as well.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It should be understood that any arrangement which may be made with reference to these bills is not to interfere with revenue bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proposed arrangement would not do so; but if the gentleman wants a reservation of that kind——

Mr. HICKS. I still insist on my objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I think there would be no objection if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would modify his request so that the Oklahoma bill shall be considered first.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the bill for the admission of New Mexico is already pending and has been partially considered.

Mr. BURROWS. That will make no difference.

Mr. SPRINGER. It can be finished in a very few minutes, if gentlemen do not desire to speak further.

Mr. BURROWS. We can take up the Oklahoma bill and finish that, and afterward resume the consideration of the New Mexico bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think gentlemen ought not to ask that.

Mr. BURROWS. I simply made the suggestion that in this way the objection could be avoided.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think gentlemen are unduly sensitive about Oklahoma. There are more than 500,000 people in that Territory, and Congress will not at this session neglect its duty in regard to those people.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; and the House is dividing.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. While the House is dividing, I ask unanimous consent to say that immediately after the reading of the Journal on the first day of the session after the new year begins I shall ask the House to take up for consideration the tariff bill which has been reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

HAWAII.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And in pursuance of an agreement I wish also to give notice that within ten days after our meeting subsequent to the holidays, as I have been assured, the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be allowed two days in which to call up the resolution reported by me this morning in regard to Hawaiian affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to give notice that immediately after the reconvening of Congress I shall call up the privileged resolution which I introduced, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and which I understand the Speaker does not hold to have lost its privilege by any action of the committee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not understand that the Speaker has adopted the view which the gentleman from Maine intimates.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. He can do so when the question arises.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was undertaking to state the understanding of "the gentleman from Maine." I did not undertake to state what the gentleman from Ohio might or might not understand. That would be too difficult a task.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I thought the gentleman was undertaking to state the view of some one besides himself; if he had confined his statement to his own view of the matter there would have been no objection.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. SPRINGER. In view of the fact that the time for the consideration of the Territorial bills is limited to this afternoon, unless they be postponed to a late period of the session by reason of other matters which must come up, I ask unanimous consent that we immediately go into Committee of the Whole and consider first the New Mexico bill, then the Oklahoma bill, and that the Committee of the Whole shall not rise until both bills are ready to be reported.

Mr. LOUD. I think the tariff bill can wait a day or two if these matters are of such pressing importance. The House shall not pass these bills to-day.

Mr. HICKS. I desire to object to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Will not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKS] indicate something to which he will not object?

Mr. HICKS. If it is agreed that the Oklahoma bill shall be considered first, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That will never be consented to on this side of the House.

Mr. HARTER. I object to that arrangement.

Mr. REED. There is the trouble with the Democratic party: it never can be reasonable.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Did you ever hear of a proposition that a pending bill be withdrawn in order to give preference to another no more meritorious?

Mr. REED. I admit that such a proposition may be a little hard on you; but I think you might have accepted it if you had been really well-disposed. [Laughter.]

[The count by tellers continued for some time.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Before the count by tellers was concluded a message from the Senate, by Mr. COX, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 104) for the relief of Gen. Napoleon J. T. Dana;

A bill (S. 121) for the relief of William A. Starkweather, of Oregon;

A bill (S. 464) for the issue of ordnance stores and supplies to the State of Nebraska, to replace similar stores destroyed by fire.

A bill (S. 1045) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate four obsolete gun-carriages to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa; and

A bill (S. 1267) authorizing the attorney for the District of Columbia and his assistants to administer oaths and affirmations.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 21st day of December, present, they stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1894.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] will withdraw his motion, the House is now ready to adjourn.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I withdraw the motion.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, a reprint will be ordered of the bill (H. R. 4854) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the "Bowman act." It appears that the copies of this bill already printed have been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks leave on behalf of a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary to file and have printed during the recess of the House their views on the bill (H. R. 4609) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, referring to the privilege to print the minority views, I also desire to ask that the majority have leave to file its report. I did not understand that there would be a minority report submitted, and hence the majority report is simply a recommendation that the bill pass.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, leave will be granted to both the majority and the minority of the committee to file their views during the vacation.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On December 21, 1893:

An act (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 288) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 2668) authorizing the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to approve postmasters' bonds;

An act (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.; and

An act (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home.

MINORITY REPORT ON TARIFF BILL.

Mr. REED, in pursuance of previous leave, presented the views of a minority of the Committee on Ways and Means on the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, January 3, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

SIOUX INDIAN LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. KYLE December 21, 1893, as follows:

Whereas by Article XII of the treaty between the United States of America and different tribes of Sioux Indians, concluded April 29 et seq., 1868, and proclaimed February 24, 1869, it was provided that "no treaty for the cession of any portion or part of the reservation herein described which may be held in common shall be of any validity or force as against the said Indians, unless executed and signed by at least three-fourths of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in same;" and

Whereas the report made by the commission formed and acting under the two separate acts of Congress, both dated March 2, 1889, entitled "An act to divide a portion of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," and the other, the appropriation bill approved March 2, 1889, shows upon its face that it was signed by a number of adult Indians of the whole blood less in number than the three-fourths as provided in the said treaty proclaimed February 24, 1869, and that in order to obtain the necessary three-fourths aforesaid divers mixed bloods were solicited to, and were permitted to, and did sign such treaty made by the commission on the part of the United States, acting under said acts of Congress dated, as aforesaid, March 2, 1889; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior of the United States has decided, as it is claimed, that divers of the mixed bloods who signed as aforesaid such treaty made with said commission are not Indians in contemplation of law, and that they and their families are not entitled to any rights or privileges whatever in the land embraced in the cession to said commission, nor to any privileges whatsoever as Indians, and is about to cause them to be ejected from the so-called Indian reservations: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all orders, opinions, and directions that he has given in respect to the said mixed bloods or either of them, or to their families or any member thereof, together with copies of all reports, letters, documents, and written papers pertaining thereto.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I wish to modify the resolution by striking out the preliminary statement contained in the preamble. I shall ask merely for the adoption of the resolution itself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. KYLE. I believe the resolution was modified at the last meeting of the Senate by striking out the word "forthwith."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification has been made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution as modified be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all orders, opinions, and directions that he has given in respect to the said mixed-bloods or either of them, or to their families or any member thereof, together with copies of all reports, letters, documents, and written papers pertaining thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

DAVID B. GOTTWALS.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration a private bill, which will lead to no discussion and take but little time. It is Senate bill 439.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 439) for the relief of David B. Gottwals.

Mr. PUGH. The object of the bill is to relieve a resident of the District from the operation of the law limiting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia exclusively to American citizens. Similar bills which have been reported from the Judiciary Committee have passed the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, in line 6, after the word "from," to insert "all forfeitures heretofore incurred by;" at the beginning of line 7, before the words "of an act," to strike out "operations" and insert "operation;" and in line 10, after the date "1887," to strike out "and all forfeitures incurred by the force of said act, in respect of such real estate, hereby remitted."

Mr. PLATT. Now, let the bill be read as it will read if the amendments shall be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia, heretofore purchased by and conveyed to David B. Gottwals, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from all forfeitures heretofore incurred by the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama why he does not provide for repealing the act which prohibits ownership in the District of Columbia of real estate by persons other than citizens of the United States? This is the second or third bill for the special relief of aliens who have invested large amounts of money in real estate in this District. Neither House of Congress has ever hesitated to grant such relief. Why should we be called upon from week to week and year to year to pass special bills giving relief in certain cases? I think the whole theory of the act as it now stands, to which the Senator proposes to make an exception, is wrong in principle. Why not modify the pending bill so as to repeal the former act, relieving, of course, from forfeitures which have been already incurred?

Mr. COCKRELL. I regret exceedingly to differ with the suggestion of my friend from Tennessee in the latitude of his expression. I, for one, hope that there will not be, without full discussion, any provision made which will authorize anybody in any place in the world to come to the District of Columbia and own real estate here. I am opposed to that policy.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not want to retard the passage of this bill, but I think the bill does not go far enough.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. Gottwals is now a citizen of the United States. This bill is a copy of two or three like it, which, as the Senator from Tennessee says, neither House has ever hesitated to pass. I suppose that a general act, such as the Senator from Tennessee desires to substitute in the place of a special law, would relieve everyone from the operation of the act, whether he was a citizen or alien. I agree with the Senator from Missouri. I think these bills ought to be passed in the interest of those who have become citizens of the United States since their investment. I do not suppose that in such a case Congress would hesitate to relieve the applicant.

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps my statement was broader than I myself intended. This is what I mean: I chance to remember one case, of which I had charge, of a couple of gentlemen reared here in the city of Washington. They came here with their father when they were infants; they were active business men, who had invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in real estate in the District of Columbia; but when an abstract office was called upon for an abstract of title to certain real estate, which had come to them regularly by conveyance, it was ascertained that the father, with whom they came to this country as infants, had never been naturalized, and that therefore they were aliens technically, though they had been reared right here, identified with this community from their early boyhood, living here, and engaged in large business in the District. Whilst I would not open the door to aliens universally, I think some general law ought to provide for the case of actual residents who are engaged in business here and whose homes are here, whether or not they had been technically citizens of the United States. To that extent I do suggest that this bill ought to go.

Mr. PUGH. I understand the Senator does not object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. By no means.

Mr. PUGH. That is all I am after at this time. Any bill of the character the Senator speaks of will receive due consideration if introduced and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS RELATING TO POSTMASTERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (S. 1260) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (H. Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 4, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

CREDENTIALS OF A MEMBER-ELECT.

The SPEAKER. The credentials of Mr. Adams, of Pennsylvania, elected as the successor of the late Mr. O'Neill, have been received, but the Chair is informed that the gentleman is not present. The credentials therefore will lie on the table to be called up and read whenever the gentleman desires to be sworn in.

RESIGNATIONS OF REPRESENTATIVES FITCH AND FELLOWS, OF NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications; which were read, and ordered to lie upon the table:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 26, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I beg to call your attention to my resignation as a Representative of the State of New York in the Congress of the United States, expressed in writing to the secretary of state, and a copy of which is inclosed. The resignation has been placed on file with the secretary of state of the State of New York.

I am, with great respect, yours, sincerely,

ASHBEL P. FITCH.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 22, 1893.

SIR: Having been elected district attorney for the county of New York to fill a term of office beginning the 1st proximo, I have transmitted to the governor of the State of New York my resignation as a Representative in Congress from the Fourteenth district of that State, to take effect on the 31st instant.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN R. FELLOWS.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FITHIAN for ten days, on account of important business, and to Mr. BARNES for one week, on account of important business.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an arrangement this morning by which Friday and Saturday next will be set apart for the consideration of the Hawaiian resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and such amendments as may be offered thereto.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not let it go over until we get some information from the Senate? I understand they are investigating the matter.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The Senate can take care of the matter as it chooses.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have not had time to look into it in the House.

Mr. HITT. I can only say on behalf of those gentlemen with whom I have been able to confer, of the minority of the committee and others, that the substantial thing we desire being included in the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky—that is, a time being fixed for debate without further postponement—we are willing to have that arrangement or that understanding entered into.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the question of privilege submitted by me to this House before the recess——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair was indulging gentlemen to see if they could make an agreement. If the gentleman calls for the regular order of course that cuts this off.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call up the question of privilege——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). Being the resolution introduced by myself, setting forth that the rights and dignity of the House had been invaded by the Executive.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate the resolution.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, is not the regular order the bill to admit New Mexico, which was under consideration before the recess, pursuant to the special order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] states that he calls up a privileged resolution. The special order referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is after the second morning hour. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] will indicate the resolution to which he refers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The resolution introduced by me December 19, setting forth the fact that Executive communications to this House, accompanying the message of the President, disclose the fact that the rights and dignity of the House had been invaded by the executive department. I believe it is now numbered Miscellaneous Document 43.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration against this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Chair was trying to find the resolution indicated. The Chair finds a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of a resolution in lieu of Miscellaneous Documents 42 and 43. The Chair has not found out exactly which of these——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair please, I am not calling up anything from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but I am calling up a resolution of record introduced by myself, recognized by the Speaker as involving a question of high privilege, and from which, of course, the privilege can not possibly be divested, except by action of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. That resolution is in the possession of the House, and I now exercise my right, as I believe, of calling it up for consideration.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the question of consideration, so that the House may finish the consideration of the bill to admit New Mexico.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will state it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it in order to raise the question of consideration, in order to go on with the tariff bill?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, the question of consideration can be raised; but the Chair was only seeking to determine exactly what the status of the resolution was.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, is this the resolution which the Chair referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was referred, but was reported back by the committee, the Chair thinks, with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and with a resolution in lieu of it.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, that resolution has not, as I understand it, been reported back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought it had.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reported a resolution in lieu of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and in lieu of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and the Speaker directed that the resolution of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] lie upon the table; and the resolution reported by the committee was put upon the Calendar.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, it makes no difference what the Committee on Foreign Affairs or any other committee of this House have attempted to do with that resolution. It is a resolution of privilege, and I have the right to call it up.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Just as soon as the Chair can ascertain the status of the resolution the Chair will state the question. The Chair understands that the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] was introduced by him and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; that the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported back that resolution with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and reported in lieu of it a resolution which is on the Calendar.

Mr. TURNER. But, Mr. Speaker, in defining the parliamentary status of the resolution, is it not necessary to consider the question as to whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs had the power to report a substitute for two resolutions; and is it not true that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs is an original resolution proposed by that committee, and that it is not technically a substitute for either of the other resolutions? And again, Mr. Speaker, I ask further, if the Chair will indulge me, whether the question as to its being a privileged resolution is concluded by the action of the Chair on a former occasion? If it is, I bow, of course, without dissent at this time.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the resolution was reported back on the call of committees for reports, and, being reported on the call of committees, it lost its privilege, and was so held by the Speaker when reported.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible that it should lose its privilege on account of the action of a committee in reporting it or the time when it was reported. The decisions are uniform and numerous that a question of a privileged character can not be divested of its privilege except by action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report from the committee, so that the Chair and House may understand what it is.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call attention to the fact that I am not calling it up on the ground of its having been reported by any committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to ascertain whether the gentleman has the right to call it up. Certainly the gentleman does not understand he can call it back from the committee?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, certainly, that is exactly what I claim. I desire to call it up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report made by the committee on the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution introduced by Hon. ROBERT R. HITT, relating to intervention of United States Government in affairs of a foreign friendly government, and the resolution on same subject introduced by Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE, have considered the same and recommend that the accompanying resolution be reported in lieu thereof and the resolutions of Mr. HITT and Mr. BOUTELLE lie on the table, and that said accompanying resolution pass.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to state the question, the gentleman need not have any apprehension that he will lose any right. There is no necessity for any haste.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon of the Chair, but it seems to me that the Chair is entirely ignoring the form in which I am making my demand.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the Chair please, the Speaker has just made the statement that this resolution, having been referred to a committee, can not be called up unless reported. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to distinct rulings of the Speakers of this House that the fact that a privileged measure might be pending in a committee by order of the House could not impair the right of any member to call it up for disposition by the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not the question. If the gentleman will simply possess himself and let the Chair state the question——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the Chair to state that that was the question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Maine was held by the Chair to be a privileged resolution. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have reported back the resolution with the recommendation that it lie on the table, and have reported a resolution in lieu of that, and recommend that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] lie on the table. Now, the gentleman from Maine calls up from the Speaker's table, as a privileged question, the resolution submitted by him.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood it to be reported by the committee with a "recommendation that it lie on the table," but the House has never acted upon that recommendation.

Mr. TURNER. It is subject to the objection that it is not privileged at this time under the status which the Speaker has just defined.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, without going back to the question as to whether this was in the outset a privileged resolution, which the Chair seems to have decided and to which I bow, and without in any wise challenging that decision, which was made, of course, in the haste of the moment, but accepting it as res adjudicata, the question is whether, after the resolution which the Chair had decided to be privileged had been reported, it retains its privilege when on the Calendar? I insist that, in the practice of the House and under a decision of the Chair on a former occasion, in this condition when the report was made it lost its privileged character and can not be called up in this way. I therefore make the point of order, and insist that it had lost its privilege on being referred to one of the Calendars of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to hear the gentleman on this point.

The question is not entirely free from doubt. There have been previous rulings, and the Chair does not design or intend to overrule them at all, that when a committee has the privilege of reporting at any time, and the committee exercises the privilege by reporting during the call of committees for reports, the privilege of calling up afterwards the resolution for consideration as a question of privilege is waived or lost.

But the Chair is inclined to think that the privilege that is thus lost is that privilege only which is given to the committee. In the case of a resolution which is itself privileged without any regard to what committee it might be referred, a case where the privilege attached not to the committee, nor even to the committee and the resolution together, but to the resolution itself, the Chair does not think it loses its privilege because reported during the call; because if it did, then a committee, by exercising its right to report a privileged resolution during the call of committees, could deprive the House of the right to consider it as a privileged matter.

A contested-election case is regarded as matter of the highest privilege, involving the right of a member to his seat. Such a case is referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Elections and that committee make a report upon it. They may make the report during the call of committees if they desire to doso—there is nothing to prevent it—or they may make the report at any other time. But whenever a contested-election case is put upon the Calendar it may be called up by any member of the House.

It is not necessarily called up by the committee, for it has been repeatedly held that any member of the House may at any time call it up as a privileged question, unless some question of higher privilege is pending, and that the House will then proceed to consider it unless the question of consideration is raised and the House determines that it will not consider it. Therefore, inasmuch as the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has been decided to be privileged, has been referred to a committee, and has been reported back from that committee with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and is now in the House and not in the committee, the Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to call it up as a question of privilege. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] calls up the resolution and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] raises the question of consideration against it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I also raise the question of consideration, and give notice that I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 353) for the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I know the Chair will indulge me in a semireply to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. I desire to remind him that in the Forty-eighth Congress Mr. TURNER of Georgia——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I simply wish to remind the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] that in the Forty-ninth Congress, on his own motion, Mr. Speaker Carlisle ruled that even a contested-election case could be called up as a matter of privilege while it was in the hands of the Committee on Elections, and the Rhode Island case was so called up.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Clerk will report the resolution called up by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I hold in my hands numerous other precedents in the same line.

The resolution was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 19, 1893.

Mr. BOUTELLE submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas the executive communications just read to this House clearly disclose that the rights and dignity of the House of Representatives, as a coördinate branch of the Congress of the United States, have been invaded by the executive department, in furnishing secret instructions to a minister plenipotentiary of the United States to conspire with the representatives of a deposed and discredited monarchy for the subversion and overthrow of the established republican government to which he was accredited, and to which his public instructions pledged the good faith and sympathy of the President, the Government, and the people of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that any intervention by the Executive of the United States, its civil or military representatives, without authority of Congress, in the internal affairs of a friendly recognized government, to disturb or overthrow it, and to aid or abet the substitution or restoration of a monarchy therefor, is contrary to the policy and traditions of the Republic and the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and can not be too promptly or emphatically reprobated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] calls up the resolution just read, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that any gentleman on that side of the House raises the question of consideration on this resolution?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I raise the question of consideration, Mr. Speaker; my object being to go on with the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Are you afraid to meet this question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I raise the question of consideration, and give notice to the House that I desire to call up the bill for the admission of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order so that the Chair may state the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will withdraw the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is not in order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are not afraid to meet this question; but I will say to the gentleman from Maine that there are other more important questions pending before the House.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] raises the question of consideration, with a view to taking up the tariff bill. I would like to know now if we can agree to devote Friday and Saturday of this week to the consideration of the Hawaiian resolutions. I want to show the gentleman from Maine that we are ready to take up that question on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order for me to say a word, as it seems to be always in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to speak—I do not know that it is in order for me to say a word; I hope it is—I simply wish to say to him that he does not raise the same question that I do. I have brought in here a distinctive proposition upon which I want the judgment of this House, and I hold in my hand a large number of precedents, all of which set forth the doctrine that when a question of privilege of this kind is raised it is the right of the House and the right of the member to have it decided by the House.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky has seen fit to evolve from the Committee on Foreign Affairs some procedure with which I have nothing to do. The matter he has brought in here is not even privileged. The resolution reported by the majority of that committee is simply a declaration and not of a privileged nature, while the resolution recommended by the minority in lieu of mine is not based upon a violation of the privileges of this House, but sets forth that it is the sense of the House that the rights of Congress have been interfered with. I supposed that the gentlemen on that committee might be aware of the fact that the parliamentary privileges of Congress appertain to each of the respective Houses, and not to Congress as a whole.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] demands the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire a square vote.

The SPEAKER. This demand cuts off all debate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want a square vote on my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine calls up for consideration the resolution which has just been read; and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] raises the question of consideration. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the resolution?

Mr. BOUTELLE. On that question I call for a division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 57, noes 126.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I demand tellers.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 3, nays 135, not voting 212; as follows:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and five members have answered to their names.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all leaves of absence are hereby revoked; that the Sergeant-at-Arms notify absent members by telegram that public business is suspended by reason of the absence of members and request their immediate attendance.

Mr. HEARD. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee to permit a modification of the resolution so as to exclude from its operation those members who are absent by leave of the House on account of sickness. There are some gentlemen who are absent from that cause.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think there will be no rigor exercised in carrying into effect the order of the House. It is very important that members should be here. We are anxious to get on with the public business. If the gentleman has any special case in view it might be excepted.

Mr. HEARD. I have not. I only desired that this resolution should conform to the usual language employed in such resolutions. I cordially agree with the gentleman in the purpose he has in view.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think, as I have said, that there will be no rigor in executing the order of the House.

The question being taken, the House, on demand of Mr. BOUTELLE, divided; and there were—ayes 119, noes 28.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE and Mr. MCMILLIN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 4.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 1, not voting 199; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate of the United States:

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 4, 1894.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, recommending an amendment to the bill (H. R. 4292) regarding the purchase of supplies for the Departments in Washington; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present the memorial of a large number of employés of the A. P. Olzendam Hosiery Company, of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Wilson tariff bill. The memorialists state that if the "bill should become a law it would have a most disastrous effect upon the industry which gives them employment. Those among us who have worked in Europe know that the prices paid for labor in Europe are so much lower than the prices paid for the same labor in this country, that if foreign-made goods were admitted to this country at such a rate of duty as the Wilson bill would give them, it would have the effect of either throwing us out of work entirely, or else of cutting down our wages to about the same rate as is paid in Europe."

The memorialists further desire to inform Congress "that if we are thus deprived of our means of earning a livelihood, or if we are obliged to work for reduced wages, we will hold those responsible who vote for the bill; and we hereby assert most positively that, irrespective of former party affiliations, we will vote and work against the election of any member who will favor a bill that will cause such distress to the laboring classes."

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Eugene, Oregon, praying that an appropriation of $25,000 be made for the improvement of the Willamette River in the State of Oregon, between Harrisburg and Eugene in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of Robert Brown and other citizens of Bridgeport, Conn., employés of the Farist Steel Company, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Bridgeport (Conn.) Typographical Union, No. 252, praying for governmental control of the telegraph service; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PROCEEDINGS OF PAN-AMERICAN MEDICAL CONGRESS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth of the proceedings of the Pan-American Medical Congress, held in Washington City, in September, 1893, under the authority of a joint resolution of Congress approved July 18, 1892, 10,000 copies; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for distribution by the Department of State.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

PAYMENTS TO COMMISSIONER BLOUNT.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what sums have been paid from the Treasury to the Hon. James H. Blount for salary, services, or other expenses, as a special commissioner to Hawaii, together with copies of all orders, vouchers, or receipts for such payment.

And also to inform the Senate from what fund and under or by virtue of what appropriation or law the same have been paid.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the resolution lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

CORRECTION OF ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America (the House of Representatives concurring therein). That line 22, on page 2 of the bill (H. R. No. 3289) entitled "An act to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey," as enrolled by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, consisting of the following words, viz, "And provided further, That nothing in this act," which words were included in said bill by error in the conference report, be, and the same are hereby, stricken from said bill, and said bill is directed to be enrolled without said line and words.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Maryland if the bill has gone to the President.

Mr. GORMAN. It has not. It is still in the possession of the House of Representatives, and the object of the resolution is simply to correct a clerical error made in the conference, and to have the bill properly enrolled.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 855) to amend an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss; and

A bill (H. R. 1141) to remove the political disabilities of Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, in the State of Georgia.

SIOUX INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. KYLE. I ask unanimous consent to move a reconsideration of the resolution passed yesterday touching the mixed-blood Indians, in order that I may make an amendment by the change of one word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the resolution was adopted will be reconsidered. The resolution is before the Senate and will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (as amended yesterday by striking out the preamble), as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate, copies of all orders, opinions, and directions that he has given in respect to the said mixed-bloods or either of them, or to their families or any member thereof, together with copies of all reports, letters, documents, and written papers pertaining thereto.

Mr. KYLE. I move to strike out the words "said mixed bloods" and insert "Sioux mixed-blood Indians."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND OFFICE HEARINGS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 2796) relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no register or receiver shall receive evidence in, hear or determine any cause pending in any district land office in which cause he is interested directly or indirectly, or has been of counsel, or where he is related to any of the parties in interest by consanguinity or affinity within the fourth degree, computing by the rules adopted by the common law.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of every register or receiver so disqualified to report the fact of his disqualification to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as soon as he shall ascertain it, and before the hearing of such cause, who thereupon, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall designate some other register, receiver, or special agent of the Land Department to act in the place of the disqualified officer, and the same authority is conferred on the officer so designated which such register or receiver would otherwise have possessed to act in such case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY. The bill (S. 903) relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification, is the same bill, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 855) to amend an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 1141) to remove the political disabilities of Charles Iverson Graves, of Rome, in the State of Georgia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOHN W. LEWIS.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 71) for the relief of John W. Lewis, of Oregon.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to John W. Lewis, register of the land office at The Dalles, Oregon, $521.97, being the amount of his maximum compensation in addition to his salary from April 17, 1890, to July 7, 1890.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether his object in moving to take up the bill at this time is to allow some Senator to speak upon it, or to proceed to the consideration of it?

Mr. GRAY. My motion was to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Only for the purpose of allowing some Senator to speak?

Mr. GRAY. For the general purpose of consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator that the views of the minority are not prepared, and will not be ready for some days yet; and therefore I did not expect the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill unless to accommodate some Senator who desired to speak upon it. In that view, of course, there will be no objection to the bill being taken up.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to the Senator that the understanding I had was that the views of the minority might be submitted at their convenience, and I had supposed that they would be submitted immediately after the holidays, or as soon thereafter as would be convenient to the members of the minority who wished to participate in that report; but I do not know that that is any reason why we should not proceed to the consideration of an important public measure, which may possibly take some time in its consideration.

It seems to me that it will be in the interest of the public business to proceed to the consideration of the bill at the present time. There is no objection, as I understand, to filing the views of the minority at any time when they are prepared.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know very well the majority of the committee make no objection to the filing of the views of the minority, and it is not material whether they are filed now or a week from now; but there are some Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to debate the bill at considerable length.

Mr. GRAY. No doubt.

Mr. CHANDLER. And I wanted to ascertain from the Senator what was his object in seeking to have the bill taken up at this time.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I supposed there would be considerable debate on both sides of the Chamber, and that was the reason why I desired to have the bill taken up at this early day. My understanding was that the views of the minority would be prepared during the holiday recess and presented soon after our convening. There has been no majority report submitted with the bill, but the House bill has been merely favorably reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is mistaken about that. The chairman of the committee submitted a majority report, which consisted of the House report.

Mr. GRAY. No such report was made. The House report exists, of course, in print, and is accessible.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. The bill was reported by the chairman of the committee, the House report adopted as a Senate report, and the bill was placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. GRAY. The House report has been in print for a number of months and has been, of course, accessible.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. While I always wish to concede the greatest latitude to the minority of the committee of which I am a member, I do not see that there is any objection on the part of the majority and those having charge of the bill to proceeding now, with the understanding that the views of the minority may be filed hereafter. It is not a new matter at all; it is one which has been discussed in the other House and discussed in this Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I do not ask for delay on account of the views of the minority.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator suggest a day that will be satisfactory for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I was about to suggest to the Senator that, unless there is some Senator who desires to speak on the bill to-day, he defer his motion until Monday, when there will be no objection to taking up the bill.

Mr. GRAY. I will consent to that suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, and give notice that I shall move the consideration of the bill after the conclusion of the morning business on Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Delaware—it is not of much consequence on which day the bill is taken up—that I think perhaps it will be a little more convenient to some Senators on this side, or it would be to me if I am to take part in the debate, to have the bill stand until Tuesday, for a special reason. Monday is a day, especially after the Senate has already voted to adjourn over until Monday, which is pretty apt to be taken up by an accumulation of matters.

Mr. GRAY. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts might have some religious scruples about attending to business on Jackson day. Monday will be the 8th of January.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have kept before the country the example of that distinguished Democrat, both in the matter of submitting to the laws of the country in all parts of the Union, and also his very wise and admirable views on protection. Perhaps, therefore, the influences of Monday would be very good on everybody if we should take up the bill on Tuesday.

Mr. GRAY. It is to be hoped so.

Mr. HOAR. If it makes no difference to the Senator——

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. It would be a little more agreeable if he would defer his motion until Tuesday.

Mr. GRAY. So far as I am concerned, I will consent to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and now give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the morning business, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes, being the bill which came from the House of Representatives, and which has been reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I shall then ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration and continue that consideration until a conclusion is reached.

DISTRICT WATER MAINS AND SEWERS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 4571.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to hear a word of explanation in relation to that bill. I ask the Senator to explain its operation and what effect it will have.

Mr. PROCTOR. The purpose of the bill is to avoid the continual cutting up and repair of the concrete in extending service connections to houses. The bill will perhaps be best explained by the very brief report of the District Commissioners on Senate bill 872, which is identical with the pending bill from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the report read?

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to have the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PROCTOR on the 3d instant:

The Committee on the District of Columbia have had this bill under consideration and recommend its passage. It is identical with Senate bill No. 872, and reference is made to the report on that bill, and also to the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in favor of its passage.

[Senate Report No. 90, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 872) "To make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia," report:

Your committee have considered the same and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute bill. The substitute does not change the purpose of the original bill, but only the means of carrying it into execution. The reasons for the changes in the details of the bill are sufficiently stated in the report of the Commissioners, which is herewith submitted.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, September 29, 1893.

SIR: Senate bill 872, Fifty-third Congress, first session, referred to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for examination and report, requires modification in order to secure the result desired. There is no such thing as a "compulsory permit system for laying water mains," and the bill contains no provision for paying for the proposed connections, and no provision for crediting the assessments collected so as to reimburse the appropriations.

An amended form of the bill covering these points is herewith submitted.

The Commissioners strongly recommend the amended bill for favorable consideration. The object sought to be obtained by it is a worthy and a necessary one. For many years the law has required (paragraph 19, section 5, of the act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, approved June 11, 1878) that the Commissioners shall require connections to be made with sewers and water mains before the pavements are laid; but the act furnished no means for carrying this provision into effect. It has consequently been a dead letter; the most the Commissioners could do was to notify property-owners that the pavement was about to be laid, and request them to make connection with the sewers and water mains, but in the general case this request has not been complied with, and new asphalt pavements have frequently been cut into and patched for sewer and water connections almost as soon as they have been laid.

If the bill becomes a law it will be a benefit to the District in preserving the pavements and macadam, and a saving to the property-owner of the expense of cutting and repairing the pavement or macadam.

It will also go far to obviate a difficulty, which is of frequent occurrence, growing out of the poor quality of the work often done in connecting with water mains; the service pipes frequently leak and the escaping water travels long distances under the pavement before reaching the surface, so that the pavement has to be mutilated in many places in order to trace the leak to its source. While the expense of these repairs falls on the property-owner, a patched pavement is never the equivalent of a new pavement. If the connections were put in by the District the work could be done with the same care that water mains are laid, and leaks in service pipes would be as rare as they now are in the mains.

Very respectfully,

MYRON M. PARKER,
Acting President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand that the work to be done is to be paid for out of the general appropriations for the District, and then afterwards recouped by assessing the property-owners?

Mr. PROCTOR. That is the effect.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether there is an appropriation sufficient for that purpose? Will the passage of the bill not necessitate an increase in the general appropriations for the support of the District?

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not hear the Senator's query.

Mr. GORMAN. The question I asked the Senator from Vermont was whether, under the provisions of this bill, the Commissioners would proceed to make the connections with the water mains running into side lots, and then assess hereafter for the improvement? I understand that is the provision of the bill. In the mean time I inquire what provision has been made for this work? Will it require an additional appropriation by the Government?

Mr. PROCTOR. I understand not. The assessment will be made immediately, and the payment by the property-owner will be put to the credit of the appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. My attention has just been called to the bill. I do not see very well how the proposed improvements can be paid for out of the current appropriations, because there are no current appropriations which can be made applicable, unless other work on sewers is stopped. It seems to me that the bill might be amended in some form so as to carry an appropriation, or by providing that it shall not take effect until proper appropriations shall be made.

Mr. PROCTOR. The District Commissioners and the committee were of the opinion that the connections might be made properly and more cheaply while the work on the mains was going on, without additional appropriations; that in fact money would be saved and the expenditure recouped at once by the payment by the owner of the lot, which payment would go to the credit of the appropriation.

Mr. GORMAN. With the object the Senator has in view I am in entire sympathy, provided proper provision be made for carrying it out; but the suggestion I make to the Senator—I have not read the bill carefully—is that it would require an expenditure from some general appropriation already made, that there is no general appropriation available, and the passage of the bill would probably involve an increased appropriation at the present session. I hardly think that it is feasible, in the present condition of our affairs, to have an increase. Therefore I suggest to the Senator that he let the bill go over until Monday next so that he may look into the matter and provide that the improvements shall be made, but that the money shall be levied upon the property-holders and paid into the Treasury, so as to meet the expense without looking to Congress for a further appropriation. With such safeguards I think the bill is wise.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator has stated the purpose of the bill and I think it is covered, but I think the suggestion of the Senator a proper one that the bill go over so as to give the Committee on Appropriations an opportunity to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN STARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 15) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark in the city of Manchester, N. H.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BERRY. Let the bill go over. I object to its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the bill goes over, I simply desire to say to the Senator from Arkansas that a similar bill appropriating $50,000 has passed the Senate three times I think. The proposition now is to reduce the amount to $40,000. It seems to me the Senator ought not to object.

Mr. BERRY. It is true that such a bill has passed the Senate the number of times stated by the Senator from New Hampshire. It is also true that I have opposed it every time it has been pressed. I do not believe in appropriating money in this way for statues in the States, or anywhere else in the country. I think at the present time, in view of the condition of the Treasury and the situation in the country, it is not well to appropriate money for such purposes. I am therefore opposed to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator insist upon his objection?

Mr. BERRY. Yes; I should rather have it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over under objection.

UMATILLA IRRIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. DOLPH. This morning the Committee on Indian Affairs reported a little bill to extend for two or three years the time for the construction of a ditch across the Umatilla Indian Reservation. The work has been delayed on account of the difficulty of obtaining money and the business disturbance. It is merely a local matter to which no one can have any objection. I ask that it be acted upon this morning, as there is urgency about the matter.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 15) extending the time allowed the Umatilla Irrigation Company for the construction of its ditch across the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time prescribed by the act of Congress of February 10, 1891, for the completion of the irrigating ditch or canal of the Umatilla Irrigation Company across the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, is hereby extended for three years from said date

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the privileged resolution that was before the House yesterday is not now pending, no action having been taken upon it?

The SPEAKER. It has not been called up this morning.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does it not come over from yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The proceeding fell with the adjournment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution again for consideration, and I desire the House to make some disposition of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order that the call of committees having been commenced, and one committee having been called, that order can not be interfered with until it is exhausted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the call had not been commenced.

Mr. McMILLIN. It had been commenced. The Clerk had called one name.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] immediately after the call of committees for reports is concluded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It makes no difference.

Mr. McMILLIN. It makes a difference as to the orderly procedure of the House.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees for reports. No reports of a public character were presented.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the resolution that was pending yesterday on a question of consideration. I desire that the House may take some action upon it, and dispose of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I raise the question of consideration against the bill, in order to consider revenue bills.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I raise the question of consideration in order to call up the bill for the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it in order for a member to raise the question of consideration in favor of something else? Is not the proper motion simply to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman can raise the question of consideration. Of course the House can determine whether it will proceed to consider the question or not.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have been candid with the gentleman, and have stated to him what my object was.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in order for a member to raise the question of consideration for a certain stated purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. Oh, if we get down to infinitesimal points, I might make the point of order against the remarks of the gentleman in speaking upon a question which is not debatable.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] was entitled to raise the question of consideration simply: but he went beyond that, and I call him to order. He ought to set a good example.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], which he desires to call up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that any intervention by the Executive of the United States, its civil or military representatives, without authority of Congress in the internal affairs of a friendly recognized government, to disturb or overthrow it, and to aid or abet the substitution or restoration of a monarchy therefor, is contrary to the policy and traditions of the Republic and the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and can not be too promptly or emphatically reprobated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] calls up this resolution for consideration, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] raises the question of consideration upon it. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the resolution?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the House will take this matter up and dispose of it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. BOUTELLE, there were—ayes 58, noes 124.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McMILLIN. To save time, I will ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order that it is not in order for a gentleman in making a motion to say "to save time I will make such a motion." [Laughter.] I call the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 0, nays 150, not voting 201; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 5, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged question that was pending yesterday when the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] desires to present a report from the Committee on Rules, which is a matter of higher privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order that the question of privilege was pending when the House adjourned yesterday. The House adjourned pending a decision as to whether the question of privilege should be considered or not, and I make the point that it must come up again this morning.

The SPEAKER. The matter is very plain, if the gentleman will reflect on it for a moment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] called up yesterday a certain resolution. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] raised the question of consideration; the House proceeded to vote upon that question, and upon that vote no quorum was developed. The vote related solely to the business of that day.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The question of consideration related to the business of that day, but the privileged question, if the Speaker please, was placed before the House for disposal, and the House has not disposed of it.

The SPEAKER. It was not before the House. The gentleman from Maine called it up and the question of consideration was raised against it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I called up the privileged resolution and the Speaker caused it to be read.

The SPEAKER. And the question of consideration was raised, and upon that question no quorum voted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Speaker caused the privileged resolution to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker caused it to be read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And the question was what would the House do with it. The House proceeded to vote upon that question, but failed to determine whether it would take it up or not.

The SPEAKER. That is a proceeding that may be renewed each day.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Where is the privileged resolution, then?

The SPEAKER. Exactly where it was.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But where is it, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk began to read the resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

[Confusion in the Hall.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Clerk will report the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will take their seats, and business will be suspended until members comply with the order of the Chair. [A pause.] The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to reserve all points of order against the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think I am entitled to an answer from the Chair. I ask the Chair where my resolution is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I know; but the Chair has not stated where that resolution is which he says is before the House. Where is the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution presented from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That after the passage of this resolution the House shall meet each legislative day at 11 o'clock a. m.; that, beginning to-day, without intervening motion, except conference reports and reports from the Committee on Rules, the Journal shall be read, business under clause 1, Rule XXIV, shall be disposed of, the Speaker shall call the committees for reports, and then the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 4864, "a bill to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes;" that general debate on said bill shall be limited to the hour of adjournment on Wednesday, the 10th of January; that on Thursday, the 11th of January, present, said bill shall be read through, and shall from day to day be open to amendment in any part thereof; that on Thursday, the 25th of January, at the hour of 12 o'clock m., said bill, with all amendments recommended by or that may be pending in Committee of the Whole, shall be reported to the House; that the previous question shall then be considered ordered upon pending amendments and the bill to its passage. That, without other motion, the vote shall then be taken on the pending amendments, on the engrossment and third reading, on a motion to recommit with or without instructions, should such motion be made, on the final passage of the bill, and on a motion to reconsider and lay on the table. That, beginning on Monday next, at the hour of 5:30 o'clock each day, the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock; the evening session to be devoted to general debate on said bill only. General leave to print remarks on said bill is hereby granted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided heretofore—and such decision was appealed from and the judgment of the Chair sustained by the House—that the question of consideration can not be raised against a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is entirely correct.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I appeal from that ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. On the point of order which I reserve I would like to be heard. I will first inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi whether this proposition was introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on Rules, or whether it originated in the committee?

Mr. CATCHINGS. The proposition originated with the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURROWS. Then, Mr. Speaker, while I am aware the Chair has held that the Committee on Rules has the power to originate propositions, yet that ruling was made some time ago; and I am in hopes the Chair has upon further examination found that ruling to be erroneous, for it is perfectly——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion that we can not hear a word of what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, so that the gentleman occupying the floor may be heard.

Mr. BURROWS. In Rule XI, as the Chair is aware, provision is made for the disposition of all propositions introduced in the House of Representatives, directing to what committees they shall be referred. I need not enumerate these various provisions, but will only say that so far as regards the Committee on Rules it is provided by clause 51 of this rule that—

All propositions touching the rules and joint rules and order of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Now, here is a proposition which not only relates to the order of business, but involves a change of the rules of the House, among them that rule in particular which provides for daily sessions of the House at 12 o'clock, and the practice, which has grown into a rule, that no speeches can be printed in the RECORD unless they are delivered on the floor of the House.

The proposition now offered by the committee goes beyond a change of the "order of business" and proposes to change a rule of the House; and that being so, I submit that any such proposition relating to the rules, or the joint rules, or the order of business, must have its inception in the House and be referred to the Committee on Rules, in order to give that committee jurisdiction. It being conceded that this has not been done, I submit that the committee on its own motion can not bring into the House a proposition to change the rules or fix an order of business; that it has no more jurisdiction to do this than any other committee of this House. I maintain that the rule requiring all such propositions to be referred to the Committee on Rules presupposes that any such proposition must originate in the House; and there having been no such action in this case, I submit that the committee is powerless to make this report.

As I said in the beginning, I am aware the Chair has ruled to the contrary on the position I am now maintaining; but I am confident in my own mind the ruling was erroneous, and that such a proposition must have its inception in the House and be referred to the committee in order to clothe that committee with power to act.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The question has been decided, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was merely trying to ascertain whether the decision heretofore made by the Chair on this question was appealed from and the judgment of the Chair sustained by the House. The Chair has not yet been able to turn to the record on the subject.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to the Chair that according to my recollection an appeal was taken, and the ruling of the Chair was sustained by the House.

The SPEAKER. The mind of the Chair was not clear on that question.

Mr. BURROWS. But that decision, I think, related simply to an order of business and not to a change of the rules.

The SPEAKER. In the Fifty-second Congress it was decided that the Committee on Rules was authorized to report on the rules or order of business notwithstanding the proposed rule or order had not been specially referred to that committee. Now, whether that ruling was appealed from the Chair does not know. He will ascertain the fact in a moment.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not remember.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect whether the House reviewed that decision or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it did.

Mr. BURROWS. If the Chair will pardon me, I think in that case the report provided only for an order of business, without changing the hour of meeting of the House, which is a change of rule, and also without providing that members of the House might be permitted to print anything they may desire in the RECORD, which is a change of a custom so long established that it has grown into law.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman will understand that almost any order fixing a time for the consideration of a measure is, pro tanto at least, a change of the rules.

Mr. BURROWS. It is not a change of the rule only as to the consideration of the proposition. For instance, any matter reported from a committee is assigned to its regular place on the Calendar, where it remains to be taken up in its order unless some rule is interposed to change that order. If this resolution is held to be in order, providing as it does for a change of the practice or custom or rule of the House, the committee might go further, and report a change of its own volition all of the standing rules. Because, if you can change one standing rule, as to the meeting of the House, for instance, or the method of publishing the speeches of members, then the Committee on Rules on its own motion can change any or all of the rules and provide an entirely new code of procedure.

The rule provides for a mode of changing the order of business by taking a measure on the Calendar out of its regular order and bringing it before the House for immediate consideration, giving it precedence in consideration over other matters. The rule therefore simply relates to the order of business. It gives the committee authority only to take a measure out of its order on the Calendar, bring it before the House, and give it precedence in consideration. That I suppose to be the scope of the provision of the rule allowing the committee to fix the order of business. But manifestly it was not the intention of the rule to allow the committee to report of its own motion a complete modification of the rules or change the entire body of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal a decision bearing upon this point during the last Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CATCHINGS submitted a report from the Committee on Rules recommending the adoption by the House of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this order the Speaker shall, in compliance with clause 2 of Rule XXIV, call the committees for reports; and reports then made shall be by the Speaker referred to the appropriate Calendars; and no motion shall be entertained or be in order until this order shall have been fully executed."

Mr. BURROWS objected to the reception of said report upon the ground that, as appeared from the Journal and the RECORD, no such resolution, or similar resolution, had been referred to the Committee on Rules, and that the committee therefore had no jurisdiction to report the proposed resolution, and that, pursuant to clause 51 of Rule XI, all proposed action touching the rules and order of business must in the first instance be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Speaker overruled the objection, holding that under the provisions of clause 57 of Rule XI the Committee on Rules had authority to report at any time on the rules and order of business of the House, notwithstanding the proposed rule or order had not been specially referred to that committee.

Mr. BURROWS appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FITCH moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative; there being—yeas 173, nays 55, not voting 125.

Mr. BURROWS. I have only this suggestion to make: It will be observed the order there referred to did not embody a change in the rules of the House or any modification of the standing rules. It simply related to the order of business by directing the taking up and consideration of a certain measure out of its order.

The SPEAKER. The hour of meeting, the gentleman is aware, is not a matter of standing rule, but merely an order of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. It is a rule of the House, nevertheless.

I was simply wondering whether it would make any change, in the opinion of the Chair, as to the power of the committee to report a code of rules without having it first introduced in the House and referred to the committee in the proper way. Of course the decision is broad enough to permit the committee to bring in, of its own motion, a complete body of rules for the government of the House without having it first introduced in the House and referred under the rule to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The question seems to have been already decided.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Under what rule does the Chair decline to entertain my appeal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the question now before the House is the demand for the previous question, and it is not the duty of the Chair, pending the demand, or on the request of the gentleman from Maine, to furnish him any information on that point. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. But it is the privilege of the gentleman from Maine to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 138, noes 0.

Mr. REED. No quorum.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 1, not voting 181; as follows:

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I am paired with my colleague [Mr. BELDEN] on all party questions, reserving the right to vote to make a quorum. I have voted on this question to help to make a quorum. Should there be a quorum, I would withdraw my vote. The reason I make this statement is that the New York papers published the statement this morning that on yesterday I failed to vote. The reason why I did not vote was on account of being paired with my colleague [Mr. BELDEN].

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask that my colleague [Mr. LAWSON] be excused on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. He was excused on yesterday.

The Clerk completed the call.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-three gentlemen, more than a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REED) there were—ayes 144, noes 49.

Mr. REED. I think we had better have tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. REED and Mr. CATCHINGS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 135, noes 10.

Accordingly, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COMPTON in the chair). The doors will now be closed, the Clerk will call the names of those gentlemen who failed to respond on the first call, and on this call excuses will be in order.

Mr. MCALEER (when the name of Mr. SIPE was called). I ask that Mr. SIPE be excused for the day, on account of sickness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOUTELLE and Mr. CATCHINGS addressed the Chair.

Mr. CATCHINGS was recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call up the report of the Committee on Rules submitted to the House yesterday.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] calls up a question of the highest privilege, a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order that the question of privilege which I call up is of higher order than the matter which the gentleman from Mississippi calls up, as plainly disclosed in the rules. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rules of this House make a very marked and clear distinction between a "question of privilege" and a "privileged question." I ask the Chair to have read the rule on the subject. I claim that the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is simply a "privileged question," relating to and affecting a matter of legislative procedure, and that the resolution which I hold to be before the House is before the House as a "question of privilege," which is clearly declared in the rules to be, in contradistinction to a "privileged question," a matter of the highest rank of precedence. On this point I ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. REED. I hope the Chair will give this point some consideration, because it is important for the orderly conduct of business.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the Chair to have read the rule on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the Chair please have read the rule on the subject?

The SPEAKER. Both the gentlemen from Maine will recognize that it is in order at any time to call up a report from the Committee on Rules, and that pending the consideration of such report no motion is in order except one motion to adjourn.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit me to suggest——

Mr. BOUTELLE rose.

Mr. REED. Unless my colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] desires to say something——

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the Chair will permit. I desire to call attention to the distinct language of the rule. I did not make it; it is a part of the rules of this House. I read from page 426 of the Digest:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

That is Rule IX verbatim. In the Digest it is stated:

> "Questions of privilege" are sometimes confounded with what are known as "privileged questions." The latter designation applies to motions, legislative propositions, or other questions, which take precedence in different degrees over each other and over the ordinary business of the House; while "questions of privilege," as defined by the rule, relate to the rights of the members officially and individually, and of the House collectively.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that under the rule and practice of the House, as set forth in this language of the Manual, the question of privilege which was raised by me and placed before the House by the Speaker two days ago for the action of the House is now before the House, has been parliamentarily before the House from the time when the Speaker had the resolution read at the Clerk's desk, and thus presented for the action of the House as a question of high privilege. Up to this time the House has taken no action on that question. We have adjourned without a quorum; and there is no place known to parliamentary law where that resolution can now be except in the possession of the House, into whose possession it was given by the Speaker for action; and it can not be disposed of until the House takes some action upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the House for one moment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] seems to misapprehend the position of the resolution called up by him. The rules provide that when any matter is called up, the question of consideration shall not be put to the House unless some member demands it. The resolution of the gentleman from Maine has never been before the House in the sense of being before it for consideration, because when it was called up by the gentleman from Maine the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] raised the question of consideration, whereupon it became a question for the House to determine, Will the House proceed to consider the resolution——

Mr. BOUTELLE. And that has never been determined.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would thank the gentleman from Maine if he would permit the Chair to conclude his statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought the Speaker had concluded.

The SPEAKER. Upon the question, "Will the House proceed to consider the resolution?" no quorum voted, and with the business in that position the House adjourned. That question of consideration might be raised each day. For instance, the House might refuse one day to consider the resolution, and yet the next day the gentleman might call it up again. The business of the House might be in such a condition on one day that the House would not consider the resolution, and on the next day business might be in such a condition that the House would consider the resolution.

Now then, the question of consideration having been raised, no quorum having voted, and adjournment having taken place, the Chair held that on the next legislative day the resolution was not before the House, but that the gentleman might call it up again; that the practical effect of the failure to obtain a quorum was when the adjournment took place the same as though the House had refused to consider the resolution, because the proceedings of that day were ended; and the only purpose of the question raised by the gentleman from Tennessee was that the House should determine whether that day it would consider that resolution.

Therefore the Chair held and holds that the resolution was not before the House, but that the resolution was just exactly where it was before the gentleman from Maine made his motion; that is to say, it had been reported back by the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the recommendation that it be laid on the table. It was laid on the table, not being thus finally disposed of by a vote of the House, but laid on the table temporarily until called up and acted upon by the House.

Now, on yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] called up the report from the Committee on Rules, which is pending. The question of consideration was raised against that report. The Chair held that the question of consideration could not be raised against the report of the committee, for it was a question which was res adjudicata in the House; that the Chair had previously so held, and on an appeal from that decision by the vote of a large majority of the House the appeal was laid on the table, which had the effect of sustaining the judgment of the Chair.

So the distinction between the case the gentleman from Maine presents and the present question—that is, the report of the Committee on Rules presented by the gentleman from Mississippi to the House on yesterday—is very clear; for in the one case—the resolution presented by the gentleman from Maine—the House had not determined to consider the resolution which he called up, whereas on the other hand the House had entered upon the consideration of the report from the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Mississippi had demanded the previous question on the report. The yeas and nays had been ordered on the demand for the previous question, so that the pending question before the House, the regular order of business would be the consideration of the report from the Committee on Rules when called up by the gentleman having it in charge.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Now, the Digest provides, if the gentleman from Maine will permit the Chair to proceed, that—

> It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn.

Now this report from the Committee on Rules is before the House. The gentleman from Maine rises to a question of privilege, but the Chair is forbidden, under the rules, to entertain that question or any other question pending the consideration of the report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. And the pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi for the previous question, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the Chair will reflect before making such a ruling——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has reflected——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to say a word upon it——

The SPEAKER. And any suggestion on the part of the gentleman that the Chair does not reflect upon a ruling of this character, the Chair understands to be a reflection on the part of the gentleman from Maine on the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I entirely disclaim any such intention, Mr. Speaker. But I only ask to be heard before the Chair rules upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled upon the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the question of privilege that I have raised does not take precedence——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled upon the question, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I respectfully appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has exercised his right. The Chair has given the gentleman ample latitude. He raises the question every morning——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Chair has no right to speak about "latitude" as applied to my actions. I am standing here in my right as a Representative on this floor, and as a member of a minority, with a Speaker opposed to me, and with an enormous majority politically opposed to me. I am not asking any "latitude," but am asserting my representative rights.

[Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit that line of discussion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only ask for my rights——

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And on that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE (speaking at the same time). I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor ordering the previous question upon the resolution will, when their names are called, say aye, those opposed no, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BOUTELLE (speaking at the same time). Mr. Speaker, I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I protest against this whole proceeding.

The Clerk began the calling of the roll.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is not any order here.

The SPEAKER. This roll call can not be interrupted.

Mr. BURROWS. But I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. That can not interrupt a roll call.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose the House is in such confusion that tha Clerk can not be heard?

The SPEAKER. It would be proper to call attention to that.

Mr. BURROWS. That is my question of order.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order, so that gentlemen can be heard.

Mr. BURROWS. This is a very important roll call, and the Clerk may make some mistakes unless the House is in order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, so that members may hear their names when called by the Clerk.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and there were—yeas 168, nays 0, not voting 183; as follows:

Mr. HULL (pending the announcement of the result). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. PERKINS, be excused.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] has been excused by the vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was there not an uncompleted roll call progressing when this vote was taken?

The SPEAKER. There was not. There seems to be some confusion as to what was going on. The rule provides that when a call of the House is ordered the roll shall be called, that the doors shall then be closed, and that the House may, by order, send for those members for whom no sufficient excuse is offered. As a matter of practice it has been the custom, instead of having a number of gentlemen rising at the same time to offer excuses, to call the roll for excuses; but that is not a call of the roll in any such sense as when the roll is called for a vote. When the name of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] was reached, unanimous consent was asked that he be excused; that was objected to, and a motion to excuse him was made and submitted to the House, and that motion has been disposed of. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] now moves that the House adjourn. That motion, the Chair thinks, is in order pending a call of the roll for excuses. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Next Monday will be the 8th of January. On that day Governor McKinley will be reinaugurated by a majority of 81,000, and I desire to ask whether it would not be in order to adjourn until Monday and let the work of tariff reform begin on the same day? [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 82, noes 149.

Mr. REED. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. REED and Mr. CATCHINGS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 119.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of members for excuses.

The call was continued and concluded, no further excuses being offered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I send up a resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are absent without leave of the House. This order shall continue in force beyond the adjournment of the session of to-day and until the further order of the House. The Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to employ a sufficient number of deputies to execute this order and to take into custody said absentees wherever they may be found.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question on the adoption of this resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COGSWELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COGSWELL. After the adoption of this resolution, if it should be adopted, will it be in order for me to ask that my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. GILLETT, who is sick, be excused from the operation of the order.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GILLETT, will be excused on account of sickness. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON. If the order be adopted, I shall ask to have my colleague, Mr. HARRIS, excused.

The SPEAKER. He has been excused; he is absent by the leave of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. SHELL, whose daughter is very sick, be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina has already been excused.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask that my colleague, Mr. POST, be excused.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is understood that this whole proceeding is by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRIX. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CLANCY, be excused.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. HENDRIX. On account of sickness.

There being no objection, Mr. CLANCY was excused.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. These requests have only been entertained by unanimous consent. The regular order is called for, which is the demand for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered, there being ayes 141, noes 5; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague from Michigan, Mr. MOON, left the House a day or two ago very suddenly, and without obtaining leave of the House, saying that he was called home on pressing business.

Mr. THOMAS. No; on account of the sickness of his son.

Mr. BURROWS. As I now understand from my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] Mr. MOON left on account of the illness of his son. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. MOON was excused.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. CHILDS, is detained from the House on account of important business. I ask that he be excused. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KRIBBS. I ask that my colleague, Mr. SIPE, who is sick abed, be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has submitted a request. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McMILLIN. What is it?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My request is that my colleague, Mr. CHILDS, be excused. As gentlemen are aware, he is a member of the minority. He was engaged in the trial of a lawsuit in Chicago, and has been detained beyond what he expected—because he could not get away.

Mr. McMILLIN. I object to excusing any member on account of business merely.

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes; members should attend to the public business.

The SPEAKER proceeded to put the question on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order. Is a motion to adjourn entertainable under the present order of proceedings?

The SPEAKER. There has been intervening business since the last motion to adjourn——

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I beg to call the attention of the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The action of the House on excusing a member is business.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But, if the Speaker please, we are proceeding, as the Chair informed us this morning, under the rule of the House providing for action on the report of the Committee on Rules; and under that rule only one motion to adjourn is in order pending the consideration of such report.

The SPEAKER again putting the question on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 9, 1888, the claim of Dennis McIntyre, postmaster at Mackinac Island, Mich., for credit on his postal and money-order accounts by reason of losses resulting from the burglary of his office September 17, 1893, stating the amount of such losses and recommending that his accounts be credited with such amounts; which was, on motion of Mr. PLATT, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of December 11, 1893, statements of the number of indictments found for violations of election laws since 1870, etc.; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication is in answer to a resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. What disposition does he desire made of it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the communication, with the accompanying papers, be printed, and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: What became of the letter of the Attorney-General which was just read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of the Attorney-General was in answer to a resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. It was ordered printed and goes to the table.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but I will let it lie on the table until the Senator comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair called the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to it, and he asked that it be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. HOAR. He is not in the Chamber at this moment.

PERMITS FOR OPENING STREETS AND ALLEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of November 1, 1893, certain information relative to the opening of streets and alleys, for laying or repairing water pipes, sewers, etc., since the 1st day of November, 1892; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Public Printer, which will be read.

Mr. HALE. Let it be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter should be read and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it has been the practice to read communications from any except heads of Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is immaterial. The communication is about five lines long.

Mr. CULLOM. We should like to know what the document is before it is referred.

Mr. HALE. If it is no longer than that I do not object. Generally heretofore, my recollection is, the time of the Senate has not been taken up even by reading communications of any length from the heads of Departments, but they have been printed and referred, with all accompanying papers, to the proper committees. The Senate will very clearly see, as the Presiding Officer will, that if all such communications are read the morning hour will stretch out indefinitely. Nobody listens to the communications. They are printed, and are reached in that way.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, it seems to me the rule has been exactly the reverse. When we get a report from a Department the letter of the head of the Department is read, and then the documents accompanying it are ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair remembers no instance during the service of the Chair where the letter of the head of a Department has not been read.

Mr. MANDERSON. The letter of transmittal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of transmittal. The documents accompanying it are of course a totally different matter.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; and therefore the letter of transmittal simply communicating the documents and indicating the subject-matter may be read, but my recollection is that the only communications of the kind read which are of length are from the President of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Or a State Legislature.

Mr. HALE. Or a State Legislature. And long letters even from the heads of Departments are not read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that a letter from the head of any Department should be read, but the reading of an accompanying document depends upon the order of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think a consultation of the RECORD in the morning will show that the communications which have been read at the Secretary's desk this morning have been simply the letters of transmittal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Always.

Mr. MANDERSON. So far as this particular document is concerned, I apprehend it is the annual report of the Public Printer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Public Printer is an official of the Congress of the United States, and he makes his report direct to Congress just as the head of one of the great Departments makes his report.

Mr. HALE. Then he comes under the rule applying to heads of Departments.

Mr. MANDERSON. Unquestionably. The letter of transmittal should be read, and if it is the annual report, it should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter of the Public Printer.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith to Congress a report of the condition and operations of this Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893.

Very respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. A. E. STEVENSON,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of transmittal will be printed, and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the annual report of the Public Printer be printed, without a reference of the question to the Committee on Printing, as that is the usual course, and it is important to have it speedily in the consideration of the general printing bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection; that is, the letter of transmittal and the document accompanying it will be printed and referred to the Committee on Printing.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move to take from the table the resolution introduced on the 3d instant by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] respecting Hawaii, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Idaho; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Secretary's Office, State of Idaho.

I, James F. Curtis, secretary of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of house joint memorial

No. 4, which was filed in this office the 4th day of March, A. D. 1893, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 23d day of March, A. D. 1893.

[SEAL.] J. F. CURTIS, Secretary of State.

House joint memorial No. 4. (By Crane.)

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent:

That the waters of Lake Cœur d'Alene near the mouths of the St. Marys and Coeur d'Alene Rivers, inlets of said lake, cover large areas of land to a depth of 5 feet and less.

That by reason of being so overflowed all of such land is rendered useless and valueless.

That the Spokane River, the outlet of said lake, at and near said lake, is very rapid and has an average fall of not less than 20 feet per mile.

That the dredging and clearing of the channel of said Spokane River at and near said lake to a depth of 5 feet below its present level would reclaim and render very valuable for agricultural purposes fully 50,000 acres of land now valueless because submerged.

That such dredging and clearing would not be expensive, but that the land reclaimed would be of a value of at least $500,000 so soon as such dredging and clearing should be done.

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully petition that an appropriation be made sufficient to defray the expense necessary to make surveys and estimates of the cost of lowering the mean level of said lake at least 5 feet.

The secretary of state is hereby requested to forward copies of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to the Secretary of War, and to our representatives in Congress.

Approved March 3, 1893.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 870) authorizing the issue of a patent to the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions for certain lands on the Omaha Indian Reservation for school purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1305) to amend "An act relating to the incorporation of certain corporations within the District of Columbia," approved October 1, 1890, to report it with amendments, and to submit a report thereon. I am also directed by the committee to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of the bill. I ask that the bill and the report be read.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to know more about the bill before it is taken up, and would like to have it read at length.

Mr. MARTIN. I have asked to have the bill and the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that is a measure too important to be considered now. It involves a very large subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being objection, the bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to object to the consideration of the bill at the present time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the matter is too important to be acted upon without having it before us in print at least.

Mr. MARTIN. I think if the Senator from Ohio will listen to the reading of the report he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will listen to it with pleasure. I will listen to the Senator in explanation of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the report prepared by the committee may be read. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is objected to. The report will be printed, and the bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make an inquiry in regard to the bill which has just gone to the Calendar. Will the bill with the amendments be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Necessarily.

Mr. BATE. And the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the report.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4859) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Iowa Reservation, Oklahoma, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, deceased, reported it without amendment.

WILLIAM HENDERSHOTT.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I report favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 1377) for the relief of William Hendershott, of Butteville, Oregon, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, as it is a local and a private matter.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed, on application of William Hendershott, of Marion County, Oregon, and on proof being made by the said Hendershott to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the land hereinafter described was, in November, 1854, filed upon at the Oregon City land office, in the State of Oregon, as a donation land claim under the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, by Louis Forcier; that he resided upon and cultivated the same for four consective years; that he proffered final proof to said land office in 1858, and that such proof was rejected for the reason that he could not establish the fact that he was a citizen of the United States; and further, that he, William Hendershott, was a purchaser in good faith of said premises by mesne conveyances from said Louis Forcier, and that he is in possession of and has made valuable improvements thereon, to issue to him, the said William Hendershott, his heirs and assigns, a patent for the following-described pieces and parcels of land, to wit: Lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, in section 21, township 4 south, of range 1 west of the Willamette meridian, containing 97 acres, in the Oregon City land district, in the county of Marion and State of Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the petition of the claimant be inserted in the RECORD. It comprises less than two pages of written matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to inserting in the RECORD the petition of the claimant? The Chair hears none.

The petition is as follows:

BUTTEVILLE, MARION COUNTY, OREGON, December 11, 1893.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

I would most respectfully petition your honorable body for relief, as follows:

One Louis Forcier, who was born in Canada in the year 1801, and came to the Northwest Territory 1825, in employ of the Hudson Bay Company, in November, 1854, filed at the Oregon City land office a donation land claim upon the following-described parcel of land, to wit:

Lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, in section No. 21, township 4 south, of range 1 west of the Willamette meridian, containing 97 acres.

On November 1, 1858, the said Forcier appeared before the officers of the said Oregon City land office to make final proof, but failed because he could not establish proof of naturalization or citizenship.

Forcier resided in what is now county of Marion, State of Oregon, from 1842 until 1865, when he returned to Canada and has since died.

Since the organization of Oregon Territory there is no court record or any other evidence to show that Forcier has ever acquired naturalization papers or citizenship.

In the year of 1860 he, Forcier, transferred the above-described land by warranty deed to one Robie, and in 1863 Robie, by warranty deed, transferred to one Arquette, and in 1891 Arquette transferred by warranty to myself; all of said transfers being of record in this county and State.

The land cost me with improvements $1,200.

Improvements consist of one residence, storeroom, cellar, barn, all under fence, 13 acres under cultivation, 2 acres of which are in orchard.

There has never been a patent issued for the land as described, and I now pray your honorable body to grant relief.

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM HENDERSHOTT.

TIMBER AND STONE LAND PURCHASES.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands I report back without amendment the bill (H. R. 71) for the relief of purchasers of timber and stone lands under the act of June 3, 1878. Until this morning I was under the impression that the bill had already passed the Senate at this session. It is an exact copy of a bill which passed both branches of Congress during the last session of the last Congress, and I supposed it was a law; but when the bill came from the other House I telegraphed to the Secretary of State and received a telegram which explains the condition of the bill of the last Congress. It is a very simple bill. It merely authorizes affidavits to be made before the proper officer in purchases of timber and stone lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to have the telegram read?

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to have the telegram read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 19, 1893.

To Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate:

Senate bill 2275 was received here December 30, 1892, bearing a note in the following words:

"This bill was presented to me on the 15th day of December, 1892. Congress, pursuant to a concurrent resolution adopted on the 21st day of December, 1892, adjourned from the 22d day of December, 1892, to January 4, 1893. I have not approved the bill.

"BENJ. HARRISON.

"December 30, 1892."

W. Q. GRESHAM.

Mr. DOLPH. The former bill was not approved simply because there was a recess of the Senate. I think the bill is a law without the President's signature, but as that question can not be raised very well and the House of Representatives has sent us another bill, I report the bill favorably from the Senate committee and ask that it be acted upon.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the bill be read. It is short. It will be seen there is nothing in it that will give rise to controversy.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that hereafter all necessary affidavits and proofs required by law of any purchaser of lands under the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington Territory," approved June 3, 1878, and the act amendatory thereof approved August 4, 1892, in order to perfect his title to the lands, may be made before any officer qualified to take proof in homestead cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS (by request, Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair), introduced a bill (S. 1393) for the relief of N. C. Perkins, administrator; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1394) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a place of deposit for the records of the Executive Departments of the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 1395) for the relief of George P. Rowell & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF DIPLOMATIC AGENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report to the Senate their opinion as to the cases in which the President may constitutionally send to foreign countries agents, representatives, or commissioners, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and whether or not there was constitutional authority for the appointment in March last, without the advice and consent of the Senate, of Hon. James H. Blount as commissioner to the Hawaiian Islands with the powers conferred upon him by his letter of appointment and such other instructions as were given to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. I object. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. GORMAN. It goes over under the rule.

PAYMENTS TO COMMISSIONER BLOUNT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what sums have been paid from the Treasury to the Hon. James H. Blount for salary, services, or other expenses, as a special commissioner to Hawaii, together with copies of all orders, vouchers, or receipts for such payment; and also to inform the Senate from what fund and under or by virtue of what appropriation or law the same have been paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution which has been read.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator must have made that motion under a misunderstanding of the scope of the resolution. It is merely an inquiry as to how much money has been paid from the Treasury for a certain purpose, which is well known to the Senate by the message of the President, and from what fund it has been paid.

I have never known in my experience in the Senate that a committee could throw any light upon the question whether the Senate should know how money in the Treasury had been spent, and I never have heard of any delay or objection to such information. I hope the Senator will not press his motion to refer.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I shall be compelled to insist on my motion. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate that this is a very extraordinary inquiry as to the expenditure from a fund which has been placed at the disposal of the Department of State in the nature of a secret fund. It is a matter which ought not to be inquired into with great particularity. I know there are some precedents for it.

Mr. HOR. Does the Senat or understand this money has been paid from the secret fund?

Mr. GORMAN. I take it for granted that it has been.

Mr. HOAR. That is all I want to know.

Mr. GORMAN. I know nothing whatever about it, but I assume that it has been paid from that fund. I know that in the last Administration, and it has been so with all preceding Administrations, Congress, without the slightest hesitation, have placed at the disposal of the President of the United States a sufficient amount of money to conduct the business of the Department of State, and that that fund, being placed in his hands at his discretion, has always been expended without further inquiry—I will not say "always," for there have been probably a few exceptions; but the rule has been the other way.

Mr. HOAR. No. The statute settles that.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to read the statute. I do not ask that the details of what money has been expended at the discretion of the President in the secret service shall be furnished to the Senate. All I ask is whether this particular sum has been paid from that fund or not. I will read the statute:

SEC. 291. Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued from the Treasury for the purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, if the expenditure may, in his judgment, be made public; and by making or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended.

If the Senator will pardon me one word to explain my purpose, if the sum of money is one which the President thought the details of might be properly made public, then the ordinary vouchers are in the Treasury, and that will appear in answer to the resolution. If, on the other hand, it be a sum of money the expenditure of which the President thought it was not expedient to be made public, then there will be a simple voucher from the Secretary of State in the Treasury showing that. They are both public facts in the Treasury, which the Senate has a right to know, and which I suppose any Senator would have a right to go and ask for, and have shown to him as a matter of course. They are the ordinary public records of the country. All this resolution asks for—and I was surprised that the Senator asked to have it go over the other day—is that that statement may be furnished as part of the history of this transaction. That is all.

Mr. GORMAN. The question which has been before the Senate and which is attracting some attention in the country, which the Senator from Massachusetts himself has discussed, and which is being examined by the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, ought to be settled and determined by this body without reference to the amount of money which has been expended during this Administration or the preceding Administration. It is too big a question, it is too great a question, to be brought down to the mere amount of the expenditure of money.

I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that, as an American Senator, I should consider it a great misfortune, under the peculiar circumstances, if this body were to enter upon an inquiry as to the amount of money which either the last or the present Administration has expended in this matter. It was a question which two years ago rose above party. At the disposal of the President was placed a fund so that he might protect the interests of this great country. I have no doubt that President Harrison discharged conscientiously, and as he thought best, his duty for the interests of the entire country. No inquiry as to his action was attempted then or is attempted now, and if the attempt were made upon this side of the Chamber I should take the same position that I do about this resolution. That was a matter which the honor of the country required that we should not make inquiry about.

I say to the Senator that I thought when he introduced the resolution he did it without full thought and without having considered to where it would lead; that this was a matter, at least, which both sides of this Chamber would determine had better be left with the executive branch of the Government, and about which there should not be further inquiry on the part of the Senate of the United States. We can not enter upon any portion of this inquiry without extending it to the whole subject. I believe that the best interests of all require that at least this branch of the question should be passed over and not considered. Let us go on with the other question when we shall be ready and when all the facts are before us, and determine it in the interests of our country and in the interests of honor and of right.

But, Mr. President, if this particular fund, which has always been a large one since I have had the honor of being a member of this body, placed in the hands of the Secretary of State to be expended by the direction of the President of the United States, is to be inquired into, we shall hereafter, I think, embarrass the executive branch of the Government and prevent that activity in our affairs which has herefofore obtained.

As suggested by my friend on my right [Mr. VEST], the passage of a resolution of this character destroys the very object which Congress has in placing these large amounts at the disposal of the Executive.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland and the Senator whose suggestion he has quoted strangely misunderstand the object and effect of the pending resolution. The precedent is well settled from the time of the inquiry in the Administration succeeding President Tyler's, and it is this, that the fact that a certain amount has been placed at the discretion of the President is a public fact; it is contained in the appropriation bills from year to year.

The President is required to determine whether the expenditure is to be treated as confidential or to be treated as an ordinary expenditure, and its vouchers put upon the files of the Treasury Department; and that is a public fact.

I presume it will turn out—though I know nothing about it—that the vouchers for Mr. Blount's expenditures will be found in the Treasury Department in the ordinary way. If, however, for any reason the President desires not to disclose the details of an expenditure, he directs the Secretary of State to put on record a certificate that such a sum has been expended, the detail of which it is not expedient to make known, and if that is put upon the records it is a public fact, not the detail of the expenditure, but the fact that such an expenditure has been made, the details of which the President thinks it is not for the public interest to be made known. But it has been the universal practice, and there never was heard, I will venture to say, a suggestion of an objection to it that either House of Congress should know how much money has been expended. If it were expended without secrecy, the vouchers themselves are in the Treasury Department, and that should be known. All the resolution asks for is a statement of what appears on the public records of the Treasury, and not for a disclosure of the method by which the President has made the expenditure.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what object he has in view in asking for information in regard to the amount of money that this special commissioner sent out by the President has expended in defraying the ordinary and necessary expenses in the discharge of his duty?

Mr. HOAR. I will tell the Senator very frankly.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know.

Mr. HOAR. I want to know, and I want the Senate to know, and I want the country to know whether this gentleman, whose mission was conferred upon him, who exercised his authority and reported his action without the consent or advice of the Senate, was treated in all other respects as a public minister of the United States; I want to throw light upon the question whether he was in fact a private agent of the President within the precedents which have been cited here, or whether he was treated as a public agent, and the question of the method in which his compensation was paid to him bears very strongly, as it seems to me, upon that subject. That is why I desire the information.

Mr. GRAY. I do not feel at all disposed on any occasion to throw anything in the way of obtaining light on all governmental functions and exposing to the most absolute publicity all the transactions of this Government. It is a government of the people, and they have a right to know just what is being done and how it is being done. But a government of the people, Mr. President, is a decent government. God forbid that it should be anything else. I believe that this resolution, unusual and out of the ordinary course, without any precedent so far as I know, would be, if passed, a direct reflection upon the estimable and honorable gentleman who has filled to the best of his ability and conscientiously, whatever may be our judgment as to his conclusions, the trust which has been reposed in him by the President of the United States, and I have no doubt that there has not been one cent of public money expended by him and defrayed out of the Treasury that was not reasonably necessary and reasonably just and pertinent to the matter he had in hand.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I agree with him.

Mr. GRAY. I do not care to sit here in the Senate and add up the items of Mr. Blount's board bill, or how much hack hire he paid, or whether he stayed at a first-class hotel or a cheap boarding-house. I am willing to trust both the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, and also Mr. Blount, to have acted within the bounds of propriety in that matter.

Mr. HOAR. So am I.

Mr. GRAY. And I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is at all curious in that regard. I do not believe the vouchers and items of these expenditures will throw light upon any side or phase of the great public question to which the Senator from Maryland has just alluded, which now occupies the Senate, and which the Senate has committed to one of its standing committees to investigate.

I do not feel inclined, and I do not believe the Senate feel inclined, to make a departure in this case from what seems to me to have been the proper and honorable usage of the Senate in this regard unless there is some foundation of suspicion or some allegation as to irregularity which will justify and demand investigation on the part of the Senate.

Mr. President, the pending resolution ought not to be so framed as to compel the President of the United States to say that this is a matter within his discretion as to the disbursement of this fund, which was put at his disposal. It ought not to be put upon him to decline a request of that kind unless there is some real ground for it. This request is:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what sums have been paid from the Treasury to the Hon. James H. Blount for salary, services, or other expenses, as a special commissioner to Hawaii, together with copies of all orders, vouchers, or receipts for such payment; and also to inform the Senate from what fund and under or by virtue of what appropriation or law the same have been paid.

To the latter part of the resolution there might be no objection; but the resolution requires, if it is passed, that there should be produced here all the items of expense and of disbursement by Mr. Blount in the prosecution of that mission. I certainly should never have consented that a similar resolution should have been passed when Mr. Bate was sent to Samoa on a precisely similar errand without the consent of the Senate and without its advice being asked, or when Mr. Babcock was sent down to San Domingo, or when Mr. Trescot was sent to Peru, or when Mr. Trist years ago was sent to Mexico. I think we had something else to do then, and that we have something else to do now, unless there is some allegation of irregularity about this matter, than to sit here as an auditing committee upon the amount paid by Mr. Blount for board, hack hire, and possibly cigars.

I therefore move, if it has not already been done, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I am very much surprised both at the objection and at the argument which is made by the Senator from Delaware in its behalf. I do not think it ever was heard before, from the beginning of the Government down, that when there was a request for accounts which appeared on the public records of the Treasury there was an objection made, or that any Senators or the representatives of any political party were afraid of such an inquiry.

These accounts are all spread upon the public records of the Treasury, now open to any citizen who goes there and asks in a respectful manner to see them. They are provided by the statute to be put there in order that the two Houses of Congress who legislate and the people who wish to know may know what is going on and what the expenditures are.

I am very happy to say that it never occurred to me that there had been any irregularity in the expenditure. I suppose Mr. Blount is a person who could be trusted with five or ten thousand dollars. What I want to know is whether this fund was expended in the ordinary way, with vouchers, as a public transaction, and if so what is the record of it; or whether the other alternative set forth in the statutes of the United States was pursued, to wit, that it was expended on the voucher of the President.

If my friends on the other side are afraid to have the country know how this was done; if they are afraid to have any light thrown on the public character of Mr. Blount; if they are afraid that the public shall understand that while he was performing the duties of a foreign minister abroad of the highest character, he was not paid as are foreign ministers abroad, but was paid under a fund committed to the President to be expended in secret and on an emergency, I will not resist their attempt, but will let the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations and let the Committee on Foreign Relations tell us what they think of that proposition.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts is through——

Mr. HOAR. I was about to add that if I had any hostile purpose in this matter towards the Administration, or any political purpose in the matter, it has been ten thousand times more subserved by what has fallen from the lips of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Maryland than it would be by any answer to the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is not any expenditure made by this Administration to which the Democratic party is not content to have the greatest publicity given; but the Senator from Massachusetts, an experienced Senator in this body, knows perfectly well that the compensation allowed to this envoy or agent, appointed by the President of the United States, could not be paid out of any other fund except the secret-service fund of the State Department. He is aware that every dollar appropriated for ministers and other agents of the United States which are provided for by law is appropriated for specifically by Congress. He is also aware that in this very case the last Congress, without any objection on the part of the minority of this body and with the full concurrence of a Democratic House of Representatives, gave to the then President of the United States a very large sum of money to look after our interests to the south of us and in the Pacific Ocean. That Senator knows perfectly well that an inquiry as to the amount of the expenditure and the vouchers of Mr. Blount would necessarily lead to an inquiry as to the expenditure under a former Administration of bringing about results which some of the people of this country regret; but that is a matter entirely apart from this kind of an inquiry. As a member of the majority of this body, I should regard it as a most unfortunate thing if it were proposed here to investigate the action of a former President of the United States and taunt the Republicans and the Senators on the other side with the fact that they were afraid to have these matters exposed.

Mr. President, nobody is afraid of it; nobody doubts the integrity of ex-President Harrison in the expenditure of a large amount of money; nobody doubts the integrity of the present President of the United States; and no man, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, would be afraid to have it exposed to public view; but, like the consideration of the subject of a treaty, this is a matter which necessarily must be kept within the precincts of the State Department. Such an inquiry as is sought to be made now, though it has been attempted before, has always been rejected and resented, and the only response to such an inquiry that I have found, upon reaching the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States was the return, "I furnished so much money upon the order of the Secretary of State."

Mr. HOAR. That is all the information I ask for in this case.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, the Senator asks only for that in this case; but why does he ask it? His remark a few moments ago indicates what his object is, that it may go to the country that the Administration, or its friends upon this floor, are afraid to expose the details of a transaction which I regret to say has now become somewhat political, but which ought to be settled upon its merits and without regard to the aisle that divides this Chamber. I regret, in a case which is so important for the future interests of our country, where I believe the future commerce of the country so much depends upon its proper settlement, that it should have drifted down to a mere inquiry which, as the Senator from Massachusetts knew when he offered the resolution, was an attack upon the expenditure of a secret-service fund which has always been regarded sacred and to be disposed of by the President of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Maryland one question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Has he any information or will he give the Senate any reason to think that this was made as a secret expenditure under the statute and not by the other alternative where the vouchers are put in the Treasury Department? Has he any reason to suppose that such was the case?

Mr. GORMAN. I know nothing more of the Administration and its conduct in this matter than the Senator from Massachusetts. I know of no information that has come to the members of this body except in a public way. If it has come I have not had it myself. But I do know, as the Senator from Massachusetts is himself aware of the fact, that every dollar expended for the ministers, consuls, and other diplomatic agents fixed by law is appropriated for annually by the Congress of the United States; and in addition to that we place at times in the hands of the Secretary of State, under the control of the President of the United States, very large amounts of money, out of which he may employ agents and transact business which in its nature is secret; and out of those funds it has always been understood and known that in every Administration expenditures of this kind have been made. Now, from the law, and that is all I know, there can not be any other way in which this gentleman could have been compensated; and the mover of the pending resolution must have known it as well as I do.

Mr. HOAR. Then will the honorable Senator answer my question? Has he any reason to believe, and if so, will he state it, that it was a secret expenditure which was made by Mr. Blount? That is what I should like to have understood.

Mr. GORMAN. I have stated to the Senator from Massachusetts that of this transaction and every other connected with that branch of this subject I have no more knowledge than the Senator has, from the public documents and the statements which have been made in the public press.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator answer in this form, then? Does the Senator believe that it was a secret transaction?

Mr. GORMAN. As I said a moment ago, I have never known a case where any Secretary of State—the present Secretary of State, or a preceding one—could employ agents of this kind and compensate them in any other way except from the fund which Congress had given. There is no other way to do it—none known to the law.

I wish to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is not an unusual thing for the President of the United States to use the fund for such purposes and to employ whoever he sees proper. That practice is generally understood. We placed in the hands of President Harrison within the period of a year the large sum of $250,000. We placed in the hands of that President in the early part of his Administration $500,000. We did the same in Mr. Cleveland's former Administration. No inquiry has been made here of the expenditure, and none can properly be made. As I said to the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago, it is not the purpose to conceal the amount that has been expended. If the resolution were to be followed, as it probably would be, by an inquiry as to what became of the fund placed in the hands of President Harrison, I as a Senator, with greater interest in the honor of my country and the promotion of its interests than I have in mere partisan advantage, would say that such an inquiry was wrong, and it ought not to be made.

Mr. President, I voted with great pleasure to give the former President of the United States all that he thought was necessary to care for our interests in the Pacific and south of us. If the present President were to say to Congress or to one of its committees, "I want a like amount," having as much faith in his integrity and honesty of purpose as I have had in his predecessor, I should vote to grant it again, and I would know when it was granted that if afterward I were to inquire into the detail of the expenditure it would be discrediting him and, as I believe, impairing the best interests of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in dealing with this question about Hawaii, which seems to produce a great deal of feeling and friction whenever it is touched upon in this body, I think the Senate ought to be consistent with itself and it ought to preserve its dignity in the examination and further conduct of its action in regard to the whole matter. The Senate has referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations an inquiry of a very broad character. It includes the whole subject of irregularities, if any have occurred, in the conduct of our diplomatic and other affairs with Hawaii, and the committee has organized a subcommittee, which has been industriously engaged in the investigation of the matter.

The point referred to in the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts raises the question of an irregularity in expenditure. That question, of course, depends upon two facts: First, whether the President of the United States had the right to appoint Mr. Blount as an agent, or as a diplomatic authority to Hawaii, I will call it; and, secondly, whether he has been paid, if paid at all, out of the contingent fund voted for the secret service of the State Department or under some other appropriation. The Committee on Foreign Relations, in the inquiry which has been addressed to it and which it is trying to execute, must necessarily ascertain and report to this body whether the President of the United States had authority to send Mr. Blount to Hawaii, and whether he had authority to commission him to the extent he was commissioned, and, therefore, whether his action in Hawaii was regular or irregular. That question carries with it necessarily the question of any expenditure made out of the Treasury of the United States, whether from the secret fund or any other appropriation, for the payment of his expenses while he was engaged in that service.

I think it is quite unnecessary, and it is an unhappy fact, too, that so much agitation is being produced in the Senate of the United States by this and various other resolutions which seem intended to anticipate the action of the committee. Either the subject ought to be withdrawn from the committee and taken up in the Senate and disposed of entirely here by direct action, or else the Senate ought to wait until the committee shall have discharged its duty and brought before this body and before the country all the facts relating to these questions.

I therefore think that the reference of this matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations ought to be rather in the nature of an instruction to it, if the Senate wishes to take any action about it, that it should inquire and report what fund this gentleman has been paid from and whether that was regular or irregular. The whole subject of the inquiry, and every inquiry that is presented to this body now except the one offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], has been included in the instructions already given to that committee, and which, as I have observed, it is trying faithfully, and diligently also, to execute.

I do not desire to express any opinion upon what would be my judgment as to the irregularity of this expenditure, whether out of the secret-service fund or out of any other fund, inasmuch as the subject seems to be referred to a committee of which I am a member. I should rather withhold my judgment until I have had an opportunity to investigate that question. But I think all of this agitation in the Senate is premature and unnecessary, and that any inquiry touching this subject which Senators may deem it necessary to address to the Senate ought to be referred to that committee as an instruction to the committee to make inquiry and report.

I will not comment at all upon the motives which gentlemen may have for making these inquiries. At the same time I take the liberty to say that I think this proceeding is very unusual. It is hardly justified by anything we know or have heard of in respect to the conduct of the Administration in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. HOAR. After the statement by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that the ascertainment of these facts, so far as they may properly be made public under the statute, is within the scope of the duties of the committee, I consent that the resolution may go to the committee.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, if that be the construction, I shall vote against the reference of the resolution to the committee. If the Senator from Massachusetts puts a proper construction upon what has been said by the Senator from Alabama then it gives away the entire question at issue. I should infinitely prefer for myself to put my vote on record against the resolution, because I have never been clearer as to any question in my life than that the Senate has no power at all to ask the President of the United States either as to the amount of the expenditure from the secret-service fund which we have put at his disposal or the purpose for which he has expended it.

We have a general provision in the statutes of the United States which makes it a penal offense for any officer of the Government to expend the money in the Treasury or that may be under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury without an appropriation by Congress, except in this instance, where we have put under the discretion of the President a secret-service fund, to be used by him without accounting to Congress in regard either to the amount or the purposes. To admit that Congress has a right to call upon the President of the United States to give us an account of how he has expended that money is an absolute destruction of the idea of having any secret-service fund at all; and, as the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Delaware have properly stated, it is a reflection upon the people of the United States, who are represented by their President, not as an individual, but as an executive officer, to say that we are now unwilling to trust him either as to the amount or the purpose of the expenditure.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. What does he understand is the purpose of the statute, which says unless the President desire to keep it secret he shall cause the vouchers to be put in the Treasury? This is merely a request to the Secretary of the Treasury and not to the President for the vouchers which the President in his discretion may have put in the Treasury Department. That is all there is of it.

Mr. VEST. It is useless to fence about this matter. We understand what is the real purpose of the resolution, and every intelligent man in the United States will understand it. Here is a pending controversy in regard to the Hawaiian question.

The position of the Senator from Massachusetts is very well understood, or else the English language is a complete failure. He is opposed to the policy of the Administration. He is attacking it constantly and persistently; and he now seeks to obtain an advantage in this discussion either by forcing Senators upon this side of the Chamber, as he has openly avowed here, to decline to take any action because they are afraid—to use his parliamentary expression—or he wants to force the President to give an account even as to the amount of this expenditure, in order that it may be used for the further purposes of his argument. That is the whole of it. I say the idea of a secret-service fund implies distinctly and logically and beyond question that the President is to dispose of it, as to the amount and the purpose, without any account to Congress at any time or in any way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. TURPIE submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That from the facts and papers laid before us by the Executive and other sources it is unwise, inexpedient, and not in accordance with the character and dignity of the United States to consider further at this time either the treaty or project of annexation of the Hawaiian territory to this country; that the Provisional Government therein having been duly recognized, the highest international interests require that it shall pursue its own line of polity. Foreign intervention in the political affairs of these islands will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the Government of the United States.

Mr. TURPIE. I desire that the resolution may go over under the rule. I give notice that on next Thursday morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business of that day, I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the subject-matter of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie upon the table for the present.

Mr. FRYE. A few days since I offered a resolution and requested that it might lie upon the table, giving information that my ultimate motion would be to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask that the resolution be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (submitted by Mr. FRYE January 3, 1894), as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, pending the investigation ordered by resolution of December 21, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into our relations with Hawaii, there should be no interference on the part of this Government, by moral influence or physical force, for the restoration of Liliuokalani or the maintenance of the Provisional Government in the Hawaiian Islands, and that our naval forces should be used in said islands only for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens.

Mr. FRYE. In the light of the rumors of the last day or two it seems to me it becomes necessary (if not necessary, highly proper) that the Senate should give expression to its opinion, and I ask unanimous consent that a vote may now be taken on the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. I will ask unanimous consent for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the resolution which has been reported be considered at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I understood the Senator from Maine to ask for a vote on it now.

Mr. FRYE. I do. I do not myself wish to make any remarks upon the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, coming over from a former day, is now before the Senate. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, if the motion is in order, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. FRYE. I do not desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations now. If it can not be considered I prefer that it should lie over until Wednesday morning, when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] will call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that course, Mr. President.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it go over.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it go over then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

WILLIAM E. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. GORMAN. Some days ago, when Senate bill 418, reported by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], from the Committee on Patents, was under consideration, I asked that the bill might go over for the time being. I have looked at it since. I have no earthly objection to the bill. As it was on my objection that the bill went over, I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up out of order.

Mr. PLATT. I should be glad to have the bill considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). The bill having been passed over informally and not having lost its place on the Calendar, it will be read as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill (S. 418) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of William E. Woodbridge for compensation for the use by the United States of his invention relating to projectiles, for which letters patent were ordered to issue to him March 25, 1852, was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VEST. I should like to understand the nature of the bill. I could not catch it distinctly from the reading. The Senator who reported it may be able to explain it.

Mr. PLATT. A similar bill has passed the Senate twice, and I think three times heretofore on full explanation. Mr. Woodbridge claims to be the inventor of a shell, for use in rifled ordnance. His patent was ordered to issue, and, according to the rules of the Patent Office, it was then placed by him in the secret archives of the Patent Office subject to be issued at his order. Before he asked to have it issued the Patent Office changed its rules, and held that an application for issue must be made within six months; it would not issue it; and so he never obtained the patent. The present committee and former committees that have considered the matter, as well as the Senate in former Congresses, thought that the Government ought not take any advantage of that action. I have here the original letter of Mr. Ewbank, who was then the Commissioner of Patents, directed to Mr. Woodbridge, which is as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE, April 15, 1852.

Your favor of the 13th instant is received. Your application for letters patent for rifled ordnance has been examined, and on the 25th March, ultimo, a patent was ordered to issue thereon, and in accordance with your request the papers were filed among the secret archives of the office subject to your direction as to the time of issuing the same

All there is in the question whether he is entitled to compensation is whether the Government ought to avail itself of the change of the rules of the Patent Office after having told him that the patent was subject to his direction as to the time of issue. There is a question about whether he was the first inventor. Other parties have claimed to be the first inventor. All that is left to the court to determine. As I said, this measure has received the sanction of the committees and of the Senate heretofore.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHEELOCK SIMMONS AND WIFE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 79) to authorize a corrected patent to be issued for the donation land claim of Wheelock Simmons and wife, was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH September 4, 1893, and read as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill 79, having considered the same, report the bill favorably and recommend its passage. The committee adopts the report of the committee on a similar bill at the last session of Congress as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1121, Fifty-Second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill 3382, having considered the same, report the bill favorably, with amendments, and recommend its passage.

The object of the bill is simply to correct a patent heretofore issued to Wheelock Simmons and wife for a donation claim in the State of Oregon.

The facts sufficiently appear in the correspondence attached and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1892.

SIR: I am in receipt, by reference from you, of Senate bill No. 3382 entitled "A bill to authorize a corrected patent to be issued for the donation land claim of Wheelock Simmons and wife," with a request for an expression of the views of this Department thereon.

I herewith transmit a copy of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on said bill, together with the accompanying papers.

I see no objection to said bill, after it has been properly corrected, becoming a law.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE.
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1892.

SIR: I am in receipt, by reference from the Department of the 13th instant, for report in duplicate, of S. 3382, Fifty-second Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to authorize a corrected patent to be issued for the donation land claim of Wheelock Simmons and wife."

This bill was forwarded to you by Hon. J. N. DOLPH, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

The facts in this case and the views of this office upon the legislation proposed by said bill are as follows:

Lucinda Simmons, the wife of Wheelock Simmons, was formerly the wife of a man by the name of Hill. Mr. Hill died before the passage of the donation act of Congress of September 27, 1850 (9 Stats., 496), and shortly after his death his widow married Simmons.

After the passage of said donation law Mrs. Simmons, as the late widow of Hill, attempted to claim a donation of land for the heirs of Hill, deceased. She applied for and got a survey of the land claimed. As Mrs. Simmons could not complete her claim to this land under the law, her husband, Wheelock Simmons, filed his notice therefor with a slight difference as to the exterior lines, and procured a survey of the same.

The surveyor-general in platting the claim made his plat from the field notes of the survey of the Hill claim, and the register and receiver, when they issued their certificate as the basis of a patent, evidently described the land to be patented according to the description given in the survey for the Hill heirs.

The patent issued did not agree with the lines of survey as stated in the certificate. One of the courses, south 25° west 19.98 chains, was inserted in the patent as having been run north 25° east 19.98 chains. This error removed all the remaining lines of the survey quite a distance away from the proper location and included some of the lands intended to be patented and did not include other tracts, and caused the patent to include lands belonging to other parties.

Plat No. 1, inclosed herein, has been prepared by this office to show what lands would be included in the existing patent according to the metes and bounds given therein. I also inclose herein Plat No. 2, constructed from the field notes of the survey of the claim of Simmons. I notice that the inclosed bill does not describe the second course according to the field notes of the Simmons survey.

The field notes give this second course as having been run south 59° west 24 chains, while the bill, in line 14, gives this course as south 39° west 24 chains.

The course in lines 21 and 22 of said bill gives the course as running west 39.98 chains, while the field notes give this course as running west 39.93 chains.

A copy of the record of the outstanding patent, dated April 20, 1866, is also inclosed herein.

The exterior lines of this donation as described in the outstanding patent (see Plat No. 1) include tracts of land in sections 6, 31, and 36, which do not belong to the Simmons donation.

All these tracts of land which lie outside of this donation as surveyed for Simmons were disposed of and patented to other parties prior to the issuance of the Simmons patent.

The honorable Secretary of the Interior, in his decision dated March 22, 1883, copy inclosed herein, in the case of Simmons vs. Eastham, holds that the issuance, delivery, and acceptance of said patent for the Simmons claim exhausted the jurisdiction of the Land Department over the matters involved.

In view of this condition of affairs I can see no objection to the proposed legislation when the corrections herein suggested are made.

Said bill No. 3382 is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

W. M. STONE, Acting Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Transcript of field notes of the survey of the Wheelock Simmons donation land claim——

Mr. VEST. It is not necessary to read the remainder of the report. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon one question. A former Secretary of the Interior speaks of an amendment to the bill. Is that amendment incorporated in the present bill?

Mr. DOLPH. I think so. I will compare the bill and report and answer in a moment. It is an old donation claim. The title has passed out of the Government for many years; but in granting the patent the line was run east instead of west. So they do not inclose any land unless they evidence their title; and they can not do it, the Land Office holds, without this legislation. The title has not been in the Government for many years.

Mr. VEST. I understand that it is an old donation claim. I have no doubt the general object of the bill is right, but I want to know whether the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior is incorporated in the pending bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the bill be passed over informally and I will run over the report and see.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. DOLPH subsequently said. I have examined the bill that was under consideration. I find that the amendments proposed by the Secretary of the Interior are in the bill. The bill is correct as it is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been informally laid aside, it is again before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Was the bill taken up in its order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was taken up in order and passed over informally a few minutes ago.

Mr. DOLPH. It has been read.

Mr. HARRIS. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, under the rules the Senate would proceed to the consideration of bills under Rule IX, but I ask unanimous consent that for the remainder of to-day's session we shall proceed under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that during the remainder of to-day's session the Senate shall proceed under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The pending bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PUBLIC PARK RESERVATION IN OREGON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 69) to grant to the State of Oregon townships 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31 south, in ranges 5 and 6 east of Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, for a public park, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOLPH. All this land is embraced in the forest reservation now. A similar bill has several times passed Congress. It would not affect that question. It simply continues the reservation, but puts the burden on the State of protecting the park from being despoiled or trespassed upon. All the land has been withdrawn from settlement for several years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The bill (S. 355) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned Fort Maginnis military reservation, in Montana, under the mining and homestead laws, for educational and other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 9, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 8, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read, corrected, and approved.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call up the report from the Committee on Rules, the pending question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call up the privileged question that I have raised.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] calls up the pending resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call up the question of privilege that I have raised, and that I claim to be pending.

The SPEAKER (continuing). The gentleman from Mississippi calls up the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the question of privilege——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has called up a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order, if the Speaker pleases, that the action of the Speaker in giving precedence, or attempting to give precedence, to a report of the Committee on Rules at this time over a question involving the highest privileges of the House, is "in violation of the honor, dignity, and privileges of the House," under the rulings of this House as shown by the Journal of the Forty-ninth Congress, first session. I demand that the question shall be submitted to the House for its determination, as otherwise the privileges of the House might be absolutely abrogated in every contingency that could possibly arise.

In the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 2548 of the Journal, this rule was laid down by Speaker Carlisle, in accordance with the uniform practice of the House:

Whenever a point of order is made that any matter or proceeding is in violation of the honor, dignity, or privileges of the House, it is not a question for the Chair but for the House itself to determine.

Under this ruling, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is absolutely incumbent on the Speaker of the House to submit to the House, itself to decide, the question whether the privileges of the House, in determining the integrity of its own rights, proceedings, and functions, which are alleged to have been invaded, overthrown, or usurped by the Executive, presents a question of higher privilege than a mere rule as to the number of hours the House shall devote to the discussion or consideration of any bill.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of which the House itself must take cognizance, for there is not a court in the United States sitting on any case that is not, under the rulings and precedents of the common law, required to take cognizance of notorious facts and matters of public information. Certainly nothing is more notorious than the facts proclaimed in every portion of the public press that the acts and circumstances which form the basis of this question of privilege that I have brought before the House, and the House's action on which I think to be absolutely essential to the maintenance of the dignity, the rights, and the capacity to act of a coördinate branch of the Government have become flagrant by reason of what has transpired abroad, to which I need not refer in detail.

Every member of this House knows that the situation which I have deprecated, and to which this resolution refers, has culminated already in accordance with the prediction that I made when I introduced the resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives can not afford, for any mere temporary political exigency—it can not afford, under any passion or prejudice, to ignore a fundamental question which goes to the right of existence of this House itself, which I claim has been invaded and usurped. I make the point of order, under the rules of the House, that the question should be submitted to this House. I make the point of order that these proceedings, the Speaker's refusing to entertain a question of the highest privilege and insisting upon the consideration of a rule involving only an order of legislative procedure, thus barring out every other question, would bar out a President's message, would exclude an impeachment of the President, would refuse consideration of the fact even that a President might have sent a message to this House declaring that he had usurped imperial power and assumed to dissolve the Congress. According to the rulings of the Speaker, the House stands here manacled and unable to assert its own dignity or to protect its own rights. I insist that the point of order shall be submitted to the House for its own decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if the House will indulge him for a moment, will make a statement. The Constitution provides that each House shall establish rules for its own government. This House, in the execution of that power, has established rules. Among the rules so established is one prescribing the rights of the members as to questions of personal privilege, and the rights of members in the aggregate as to questions respecting the honor and dignity of the House. The House has also provided, in the same rules, the manner and method by which the rules may be changed or altered; and in order that force and effect may be given to any intention and purpose of the House to alter its own rules, provision has been made that when a report is brought in for their alteration no motion shall be in order except the motion to adjourn, or, using the language of the rule—

No other dilatory motion.

There is now pending before the House an order to change the rules of the House. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] could invoke an existing rule to prevent the action of the House upon a proposed change of the rules, then you would be in that condition where you would have tied yourselves hand and foot, and could not change the rules that were once established. Suppose this report from the Committee on Rules was simply to repeal the very rule which the gentleman from Maine now invokes. Suppose it was a resolution to change the rules as to questions of privilege. Could it be contended for a moment that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] could defeat the wish of the House to change that rule by a resort to that rule itself; that he could say, "You shall not consider a proposition to change that rule, because I propose to ask you to act under that rule, although you now desire to change it?"

The proposition reported from the Committee on Rules is one which, if adopted, defines exactly what the House shall do from day to day until and including the 25th day of the month. And whilst it is true that there is a rule providing for matters of privilege, it is also true that this House has reserved the right to change that rule, to suspend or abrogate that rule; and the rule that is now before the House for its consideration has for its object the suspension of the operation of the very rule invoked by the gentleman, as well as any other rules which are in conflict with the express terms of the order itself. Therefore it is a question that is really for the House. If the House deems that its honor and dignity have been assailed by any action, either of the Speaker or any department of the Government, then if the House desires to proceed at once to consider that question the House can vote down this rule and proceed to consider it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, no——

The SPEAKER. But the House has never delegated to one gentleman the exclusive right to take care of its honor and its dignity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ah! but, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. That is a matter to be determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly what I am demanding. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. If a majority of the House desire to proceed with the question called up by the gentleman from Maine, if the House shall vote down the pending proposition from the Committee on Rules, then the gentleman from Maine will be recognized to call up his question of privilege, and if the question of consideration is not raised against it—or, if raised against it, is not sustained—then the House would proceed to consider that proposition. So that there is no such thing as any individual binding the House. If the House declines now to proceed as indicated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], it is because the majority of the House do not wish so to proceed at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That has not been determined.

The SPEAKER. That question can be decided by the vote upon the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the Speaker please, I call his attention to the fact—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] This is the "regular order." I call the Chair's attention to the fact that I am not arrogating to myself any special power. Speaker Carlisle, in the ruling to which I refer, held:

Whenever a point of order is made that any matter or proceeding is in violation of the honor, dignity, or privileges of the House, it is not a question for the Chair, but for the House itself to determine.

I make the point of order that it is a question which, whenever raised—and I am raising the question of order as to the ruling of the Chair—must be determined by the House. I make the point of order that the Speaker in his ruling, substituting his own interpretation as to his duties under the rules at this juncture, in place of the will of the House, is violating the privilege of this House to determine the question of order for itself. On that question Speaker Carlisle's ruling is perfectly clear—that "it is not a question for the Chair, but for the House itself to determine."

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is merely the organ of the House. The rules of the House direct the Speaker, when a report is pending from the Committee on Rules, that he shall entertain no motion except one motion to adjourn, nor shall he entertain any other dilatory motion; and the Chair holds that in the discharge of his duty as the executive officer of the House he must execute this rule. The House has made the rules. The present occupant of the Chair knows of no rule of action prescribed for him except such as is prescribed by the majority, embodied in the code of rules which they adopt.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Permit me to call the Chair's attention to this fact, which is very important here, that this can not be held in any sense to be a "dilatory motion." This resolution of mine was pending before the report of the Committee on Rules was brought in, and was recognized by the Speaker as a question of the highest privilege. I am simply asserting and urging the privilege which that resolution had acquired before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has on two previous days determined the question, and the question now is——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let us have it understood——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to know the meaning of the ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman to make the motion at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the Chair has recognized me, and has made a ruling; and I appeal from that ruling of the Chair, and say if the rules and the privileges of this House collectively are less important than the question of a rule of procedure——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please be in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain an appeal on a question of recognition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the Chair's refusal to entertain an appeal. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question——

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair rule out the appeal of the gentleman from Maine, my colleague, on the ground that it is a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had stated to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that under the rules the Chair was not permitted to recognize the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. REED. But the Chair had recognized him——

The SPEAKER. The Chair had heard the gentleman.

Mr. REED. And had ruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled practically on the same question two days ago, on Friday and Saturday, and to-day had heard the gentleman, supposing that he might have some authority to offer.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I raised the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he could not recognize the gentleman to make a motion, because the rules expressly say that he shall not recognize any motion except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. REED. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. The Chair has stated to the House that it would be in the power of the House to control this matter by direct action; namely, by opposing the adoption of the rule now presented. Would it be in order to raise the question of consideration against this in order test this very question? That the House should have control of its own proceedings would seem to be beyond dispute; but it can not have control of its own proceedings under the rules, as gentlemen upon the Democratic side are called upon to vote against a rule which otherwise they might desire.

They might be willing to vote against consideration upon the ground that as soon as they had disposed of this Hawaiian matter, either by laying it on the table or refusing to consider it, they could then proceed upon this proposed rule. But if they defeat the rule they deprive themselves of that right; and I take this occasion to suggest to the Chair that perhaps there ought to be a revision of the former ruling of the Chair, that the House could not raise the question of consideration against a report of the Committee on Rules. This is one of the bad consequences to which that ruling has led. That ruling, I think, was made under a mistaken idea that there was some analogy between the present situation and a motion for the suspension of the rules.

Of course, if the Chair believed that my colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] was presenting this matter for purposes of delay, or anything of that sort, then, under the general parliamentary law of every civilized body, the Chair would have the right to rule it out, subject to future corrective action by the House if there were any abuse; but surely we ought not to be put in a position where the House may not take up a question relating to its own dignity by disposing temporarily of a proposition to change the rules without being obliged to dispose of it permanently. Allow me in this connection, in order to show the importance of this situation, and of the course of action that ought to be taken in regard to it, to suggest to the Chair a possibility. Suppose it were within the knowledge of any member of the House at this moment that somebody, some band of undisciplined or of disciplined people, were marching upon this House, and the House might desire to call for proper aid in order to preserve its existence. Suppose a member should rise in his place and say that he desired to present that as a question of the highest privilege, and to ask for action on the part of the House in order to preserve its own existence. Nobody would for an instant dispute the superior right of that question over the present proposition which the Speaker is about to lay before the House. The Chair will please observe that this point does not depend upon the importance of the question presented. I put an extreme case, because it is only by putting an extreme case that we can see the full extent of the ruling. The principle is precisely the same whenever any question of privilege is presented to the House, and the House alone can determine whether the question is of sufficient importance to justify the interruption of its present business.

Now let me say that a question of privilege is not dependent upon a rule of this House. Without any rule it is inherent in the nature of a legislative body that it must have the right to interrupt temporary business for the purpose of preserving its own existence; and what is necessary in order to preserve its own existence can only be determined by the House itself. I think that possibly the Speaker may have been led into error in regard to this—if he is in error. I mean to speak with perfect respect upon this subject, because I understand somewhat of the difficulties of ruling upon questions which spring up suddenly, and even of ruling upon questions as to which one has plenty of time for deliberation. But the question, I say, must be determined by the House, either primarily by the Speaker, with an appeal from his decision, or by submission to the House itself.

Now, this being the case, ought there not to be a series of rulings which will allow the House to remain in that position? It is perfectly true that the House has a right to change its rules, not merely under the Constitution, for in my judgment the Constitution is only declaratory of an inherent power which exists in every parliamentary body. It undoubtedly has the right to change its rules, and if this were a direct proposition to change this rule alone in order to get rid of this question as the House might desire, why then the intimation of the Speaker would seem to be entirely correct.

But here is a general proposition, and I do not believe that by any rulings which have been heretofore made this order, either in its inception or in its execution, could be saved from interruption when any matter of privilege concerning the House itself was up. In other words, I mean to assert that if this rule were actually adopted it would not abrogate the other rule to which my colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] has appealed. If, in the midst of the discussion which is to take place under this rule, and which is limited and prescribed by the rule, any member should rise in his place and present a question of privilege relating to the existence of the House—which of course would be a question of privilege of the highest kind—my judgment is that the Chair would be obliged to rule that that question of privilege had precedence and to call upon the House to dispose of it.

Of course the thing which the Chair really has in mind, perhaps, although he may not be conscious of it, because this is a question of feeling—the feeling may be that this is for purposes of delay. Upon that question I have nothing to say except that the Chair has a perfect right, subject to the animadversion of the House afterward in proper form—the Chair has a perfect right, on his responsibility as Speaker of the House, to rule that motion out. But I interpose here—my colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] knows that I have had nothing to do whatever with the proceedings with regard to this matter heretofore——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I cheerfully relieve my colleague from all responsibility for my action in this matter.

Mr. REED. I have had nothing to do with it; but I do desire that this matter shall be put upon a basis where the rule would be such that we can transact business in orderly fashion, and it seems to me that if the Chair would give consideration to the whole condition of affairs he would either change the intimation which has already been made or else permit the question of consideration to be raised.

I am quite well aware that the Chair has been justified by the action of the House. I am quite well aware that the action of the House sustaining an appeal from the decision of the Chair is conclusive evidence, in a way, of what parliamentary law is for the time being. That I fully admit. But at the same time we all know that a Speaker is sustained ordinarily by his side of the House, and it is advantageous for the dignity and honor of the House that that should be so. Yet there have been instances where Speakers, upon examining the matter, have seen fit to submit the whole situation to the House.

I have discharged my duty in presenting this matter as it seems to my mind.

Mr. BOUTELLE rose. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to say——

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to emphasize, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment, please. On the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] as to the propriety of recognizing the right to raise the question of consideration on a report from the Committee on Rules, the Chair will say, it has always been held in this body that the question of consideration could not be raised against what is known and defined as the order of business. For instance, a gentleman makes a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain bill. The question of consideration can not be raised against that. The question of consideration is determined on that motion by voting it up or voting it down. Now, the Chair, in making the ruling in respect to a report from the Committee on Rules, regarded it as in the nature of a motion relating to the order of business, and therefore held that the question of consideration could not be raised, because the House could determine that order of business by voting the proposed rule up or voting it down, and the effect would be the same as though the question of consideration were recognized. The Chair so held in the last Congress and again in this; and the decision was sustained by the House.

Of course the Chair is aware, painfully aware, of the fact suggested by the gentleman from Maine, that very often the occupant of the chair is forced to make decisions without such investigation as he would like to give, and doubtless is often in error. But in regard to the present decision the Chair does not see that any harm can come from it, because it is within the power of the House at any time to dispose of the question presented. Take the present case. Suppose there were a great emergency, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine; it would be in the power of the House to dispose of the report from the Committee on Rules in forty minutes—to get it out of the way; a majority could get it out of the way in forty minutes. There are thirty minutes allowed for debate; and then in ten minutes more the majority of the House could get the question out of the way. So that there could be no hardship as the effect of this ruling.

Of course, if there were no quorum present, or if members present failed to vote, so that no quorum appeared, there might be some embarrassment; but if a majority of the House should desire to dispose of the pending matter, so as to reach another matter, some great privileged question, it could do so. This is not like a lingering matter; it could be disposed of certainly in an hour, so as to reach any business that the House might desire to reach.

The Chair has thus, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, given expression to the views that governed him in originally holding that the question of consideration could not be raised against a report of the Committee on Rules. The question is now upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Has the Speaker ruled upon the question of precedence now presented. If the Chair has——

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair stated a moment ago that this presented a question of order—he recognized it as a question of "the order of business." I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a question of privilege takes precedence of every question of the order of business, according to the specific language of the rule and precedent I have quoted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to express his views in regard to the question presented by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the Chair decline to entertain an appeal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman again.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair declines to entertain an appeal?

The SPEAKER. No appeal can be entertained upon a question of recognition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I simply protest against this proceeding as a usurpation on the part of the Speaker, only equaled by the usurpation on the part of the Executive.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will take his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will resume his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall do so under duress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will do so at once. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request the gentleman to resume his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It will not be necessary. I understand what force and duress are——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). And that they do not foreclose any constitutional right.

Mr. BOUTELLE resumed his seat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] for the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURROWS. Simply to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. There has been some delay in the adoption of this proposed rule presented by the Committee on Rules——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have order, Mr. Speaker. It is impossible to hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to preserve order upon the floor, and will request gentlemen to resume their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. BURROWS. I was saying that there has been some delay in the adoption of the report from the Committee on Rules, and I query whether the language of the rule itself ought not to be changed. It provides now as it stands that "next Monday," in the language of the rule, the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session commencing at that time to be for general debate only. If that is the intention of the rule it will be well to have it understood now. That is, however, its language, and of course the rule does not become operative until it is adopted by the House, although introduced several days ago. To pass the rule in its present form would require that on next Monday, a week from to-day, there shall be an evening session, commencing at 8 o'clock, for general debate.

The SPEAKER. To what part of the rule does the gentleman from Michigan refer?

Mr. BURROWS. To the last clause of the rule.

The SPEAKER. That refers to the general debate only.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes. If it is the intention to have the debate begin next Monday it ought to be understood now.

The SPEAKER. It provides for this week also. It may be necessary, however, to bring in another rule to correct that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is impossible to hear the ruling of the Chair in the confusion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan rose to ask whether, as the order was not adopted when presented—and we all, of course, understand the reason why the difficulty arises—the construction would be that the general debate at the evening session should begin on next Monday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to make some ruling as to the question of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggested that this refers to night sessions only, not to the day sessions. The Chair stated that it was the intention of the order that beginning with to-night evening sessions should be held for debate only; and if there was any doubt about it the rule could be made to conform to that intention.

The gentleman from Mississippi demands the previous question on the adoption of the resolution from the Committee on Rules, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. Before that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask if the previous question be voted down whether it would be in order to amend the resolution by extending the time for debate a day or two?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That would not be necessary. The rule itself provides that we may bring in another rule to extend the time if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 190, nays 0, not voting 161; as follows:

For this day:

Mr. BARNES with Mr. LEFEVER.

Mr. BUNN with Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. LAWSON with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. LACEY.

Mr. WOLVERTON with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. POST.

Mr. RAYNER with Mr. WEVER.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague Gen. BINGHAM. I called to see him yesterday and found him sick in bed.

There being no objection, Mr. BINGHAM was excused.

During the roll call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, before the roll call proceeds further I ask the Clerk to read clause 7 of Rule XIV.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule at the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope that rule will be enforced thoroughly in all of its particulars as well as in one.

The roll call was then resumed and concluded as above.

Mr. REED. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a fact just stated to me, that is, that there are a considerable number of members under arrest. Would they have a right to vote?

The SPEAKER. That is a question the gentleman from Maine may recollect which came up in the last Congress, and it was then held that they might vote on any question except on their own cases; the idea being that there was no power on the part of the House to deprive a member of his right to vote.

Mr. REED. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided—or, has given utterance to a dictum I should say to be more accurate—that the House might imprison a member. If the House may imprison a member, of course it may deprive him of his vote. I can hardly conceive of a member being allowed to vote while he was actually under arrest and in contempt of the House.

I should have called the attention of the Chair to it had it been called to my attention earlier; but I did it as soon as I was informed. I think it is a matter of very great importance for the House to know precisely what the situation is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, no member has been brought before the bar of the House for contempt.

Mr. REED. No members have been brought before the bar of the House, but the Sergeant-at-Arms can not neglect his duty——

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no evidence of the fact before the House.

Mr. REED. I am informed that the Sergeant-at-Arms has arrested some thirty members. If he has done so, and is neglecting his duty to report the matter to the House, then we ought to know that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Whether any report has been made to the Chair of the arrest of any members?

The SPEAKER. No report has been made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is all upon which the House will act, of course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, as a matter of fact, the Sergeant-at-Arms said to him just before the House met that he was preparing his report, but that it would take him some little time to get it in order.

Mr. REED. I understand he has some thirty members of the House under arrest.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Sergeant-at-Arms so informed me.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is not the person to whom the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms is to be made.

The SPEAKER. The ruling has been made heretofore that—

When a motion has been made to discharge from custody several members at the same time, the members thus in custody are not entitled to vote on the question; but when several members are present in custody under the same order, and a motion is made to discharge one, it is competent for the other members in custody to vote on the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is not a question of custody at all.

The SPEAKER. That simply shows that although a gentleman is in custody, yet he has the right to vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have no official knowledge of anybody being in custody.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN]. I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks to withdraw his vote, stating that he is paired with his colleague [Mr. BELDEN].

Mr. REED. My object in intervening in this matter is simply that we shall arrive at a proper conclusion. I ask that the Chair cause to be read the authority which I send to the Clerk's desk. I have not had an opportunity to look at it, have not read it myself, but I am told that it bears on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Congressional Globe, July 13, 1848, page 938.]

Mr. BOTTS moved the previous question—in order, he remarked, that they might get to the public business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia being one of the gentlemen in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Chair can not recognize him. [Great laughter.]

Mr. LINCOLN, remarking that he believed he was still a member, moved the previous question.

The Speaker announced the question upon dispensing with further proceedings in the case and remitting the fines imposed yesterday.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. VENABLE inquired of the Chair whether the gentlemen in custody were entitled to vote upon this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that they are not entitled to vote.

Mr. Pettit rose and addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Indiana. [General laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON of Alabama. I was here, sir. [A laugh.] I desire to know, if this motion should prevail, whether the amount of fees is to be paid to the Sergeant-of-Arms? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"] And if the fines of gentlemen are remitted then are the fees to be paid out of the Treasury?

The Speaker replied in the affirmative.

Mr. REED. There is a distinct declaration on the part of the Speaker at that time.

The SPEAKER. The motion was to excuse the members in the aggregate.

Mr. REED. I think the Chair will see that the motion which was pending was simply to dispense with further proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The effect of which would be to discharge the members in custody.

Mr. REED. The effect might be that; but the ruling was that they could not vote.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That was upon the theory that they were interested in the vote.

Mr. REED. I do not think that is it. It seems to me that a member of the House cannot vote when he is in custody. The House may dispose of the question and put him out of custody. I want to suggest to the Speaker that perhaps the principle may be this: The House has ordered the arrest of members; how can it proceed to business until it disposes of that question? Otherwise we should have the very singular spectacle of men under arrest and in charge of the House voting, although not free members.

The SPEAKER. Of course the reply to that would be that we have no official information that any gentleman who is under arrest has voted.

Mr. REED. It does not matter whether the Chair has official information or not, when a member states that such is the fact, on his information, and the Speaker confirms it by stating that the Sergeant-at-Arms so informs him.

I think the fact is beyond dispute; I think we ought not to hasten about this until we understand exactly what the rights and proprieties of the case are. It certainly would be a singular spectacle if men were to vote and the House were to proceed to business with members under arrest and their cases not disposed of.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REED. I should think that the proper course would be now to proceed with the members, dispose of their cases, and then have them vote or not vote as the punishment of the House might indicate. That might be done without abrogating anything that has taken place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how it would be in the power of the House, even if it were disposed to do it, to prevent a member voting unless it expelled him. You might put him in jail, and of course if you take his body away he can not vote; but if he were in the House under any circumstances I do not see how it is in the power of the House to prevent his voting.

Mr. REED. Who was the Speaker at that Congress, may I ask?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine and find out.

Mr. REED. That decision was certainly made; but I recognize the fact that it must have been made in the call of the House, when considerable confusion reigned

Mr. BOUTELLE. This simply emphasizes the necessity of first determining what are the privileges of the House of Representatives, and whether we have a free and unshackled and unarrested House of Representatives to act upon a question.

Mr. BOATNER. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear the gentleman until the announcement is made. These statements have been made during a roll call. On this question the yeas are 189; the noes are none [applause on the Democratic side]: the ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered, and move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi to control the fifteen minutes in favor of the proposition and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. REED. I desire to present this point again—that there are now members of the House under arrest, that they are necessarily, as it stands now, in contempt of the House, and I think that that matter ought to be settled. I do not ask that the matter be determined now, but I simply want to present it, so that when the question comes up for a vote the Chair may be able to find authorities and dispose of the question one way or the other. I do not care which way it is disposed of.

Mr. CATCHINGS. In what form do you call it up?

Mr. REED. I simply call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the same question will arise when we come to a vote on the main question. That is all. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if he desires to submit any remarks upon this question?

Mr. REED. I purpose to do so.

Mr. CATCHINGS. As some days have elapsed since this order was presented to the House, it may be well, perhaps, to restate distinctly just what the terms and conditions of the order are.

The purpose of this order is to so amend the rules of this House that up to and including a final vote on the passage of the bill only such business as is specifically named in this order shall be transacted. That business is as follows: It is allowable under the order to receive conference reports and reports from the Committee on Rules. It is allowable under the order to dispose of business on the Speaker's table. It is allowable for the Speaker to call committees for reports. When business of that character, if there shall be any such, has been disposed of, then, by the terms of this order, the House must proceed to the consideration of the bill. As the order is written what is known as "general debate" will expire with the adjournment of the House on Wednesday, the 10th of this month.

Beginning on Thursday morning, after such business as I have mentioned has been disposed of, the House is to enter upon the consideration of the bill under what is commonly known as the "five-minute rule," and its consideration under that rule is to proceed until the 25th, when it is hoped and expected that a final vote will be had. The rule also contemplated that, beginning with this night, there should be night sessions, the House being required to take a recess from the usual hour of adjournment until 8 o'clock for the purpose of having night sessions, such sessions to be devoted entirely to general debate. It was expected, of course, that this rule would be adopted on the day of its presentation.

So far as these night sessions are concerned, the rule reads that "beginning with Monday next," which is this Monday, "at the hour of 5:30 o'clock on each day the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to general debate on said bill only." As the order now stands, adopted literally, Monday of next week would be "next Monday;" but it is the purpose of the Committee on Rules to supplement this with another report, so that if the House chooses to do so it can begin with this general debate at evening sessions to-night. That is a trouble which springs from the fact I have stated, that the order was not adopted when it was expected it would be.

I wish to state, as a matter of general information, that when the McKinley bill was under discussion four days were allowed for general debate. This order had contemplated setting apart five days for general debate. On the McKinley bill eight days were given for discussion under the five-minute rule. One Sunday having intervened, the effect was that on the 14th day from the beginning of the consideration of that bill the final vote was had. Under the terms of this rule seventeen days are allowed for the discussion and consideration of the bill, including general debate and debate under the five-minute rule. The Committee on Rules, or the majority of the committee, had no desire to curtail debate upon this bill; but it was of the opinion that the condition of the business of the country was such that speedy action was more desired than discussion. We believed that we could not act too promptly in disposing finally of this measure.

Every man must appreciate that, so long as there is uncertainty as to what the action of the House upon this measure is to be, so long will there be an unnecessary amount of suspense and uncertainty in the conduct of the great business enterprises of this country. I have myself received communications from several managers of business industries, including some who are utterly opposed to this bill, stating that it is very much to be desired that whatever action is to be taken shall be taken speedily, and the Committee on Rules believed, Mr. Speaker, that in providing for a short and limited debate they were fairly representing the views of gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber.

This is the first time for many years that the Democratic party has had the opportunity of putting in the shape of legislation its views on the question of tariff taxation. We believe that the Wilson bill may be taken fairly as a great stride in the direction of the inauguration of the Democratic theory of taxation. Of course it is not understood that it is claimed, even by those who framed the bill, that it is perfect in all respects, for no human work can be perfect; but it is at all events a long step taken toward the establishment as a part of our system of the Democratic theory of levying tariff taxes for revenue only.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we will subserve best the interests of this country by adopting this order and by speedily acting and voting upon the Wilson bill. There will undoubtedly be an opportunity given for votes upon important amendments that gentlemen may desire to offer, because there can be no wish on the part of anybody to force through a bill which is not acceptable at least to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, or a majority of them.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary or proper for me to add anything to what I have already said. I will state that it is my intention to yield now to my friend from Maine [Mr. REED], that he may occupy the fifteen minutes placed by the Speaker under his control, and after that I will yield such time as may remain of my fifteen minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to make one inquiry. He has stated that a rule would be introduced later amendatory of this with reference to the evening sessions; is there any intention to introduce an amendment so as to give more than the three parts of days that remain for general debate?

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is a matter that we will take into consideration. My friend from Maine must remember that if two of the days which were intended to be devoted to general debate have been lost it has not been the fault of the overwhelming majority of members on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, entirely their fault.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Overwhelming majority!

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir; I mean exactly what I say.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, it didn't "overwhelm" until a few minutes ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has been overwhelmed so many times during the past week that I should think he could afford to be quiet upon an occasion like this. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I hope that my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] will now occupy his fifteen minutes.

Mr. REED. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition presented to the House is entirely unjustifiable. A bill has been brought in here which has so many different aspects that it needs more discussion than any bill that was ever submitted to the House. The House is not under the necessity, in any way, of crowding this measure. The majority of the party in control of this House is very large, and whatever it chooses to do it can do not only at the particular moment, but at any time when it sees fit. With a margin of 40 or 50 above a quorum and a majority over all of 80, there is not the slightest occasion for anything but perfectly liberal and open treatment of the other side. Nor has there been, prior to this, any system of hostility inaugurated. The only ground upon which it is even attempted to justify this course would seem to be the action which was taken upon the act of 1890. That action was then taken because the majority was not large, and also because a system of opposition from day to day had taken place to such an extent as rendered it essential that the majority should use its utmost power.

That bill, however, had been presented to the country for an entire month in completed condition; and the country had an opportunity to examine it. It had been prepared openly, not secretly. Everybody had had a hearing; everybody of either party had had an opportunity to present his views without stint and without limit. Moreover, the bill was not the establishment of any new principle, nor did it claim to establish any new principle. It was simply a revision of existing laws under the same principles which had governed those laws. Hence there was no such necessity for thorough discussion as there is at present.

You will notice that I do not bring up against this proposed rule the fact that the party which now presents it made the air vocal at that time with their declarations against any such rule. That I do not think is an argument; or if it is one, it is an argument which could so often have been repeated in this Congress and in the last that it loses its force on account of repetition. The spectacle of seeing the Democratic party repeat the actions which they condemned in the Congress when they were in a minority has been so common as not even to excite comment; and I suppose there is hardly a Democrat in this House who recalled, when the Speaker was presenting the right of the House to change its rules this very morning, that that battle was fought against the written protest of every Democrat in the House except Samuel S. Cox, who had too much sense to put himself on record in that way. [Laughter.]

The agument against the method of proceeding which is presented here is very simple and very concise. It does not allow sufficient time for the general discussion; it does not permit a thorough examination of the bill. The gentleman from Mississippi, with that keenness of insight which distinguishes him, attempted to break the force of this suggestion by saying that it was necessary that haste should be taken with the bill. Undoubtedly it is the duty of Congress in most thorough fashion to go over the bill and go over it as rapidly as possible. But haste in this House is not haste with regard to the bill. So far as we leave it wrong, so far as we leave it undiscussed, it will have to be discussed in the other legislative body; and the Constitution of the United States does not contemplate that the main discussion of a revenue bill shall take place in the Senate of the United States.

We are the representatives of the people, their direct representatives; and in our hands is placed the initiative with regard to all bills raising revenue. Upon us rests the first duty to consider carefully this measure; upon us rests the necessity of framing a bill which shall be satisfactory to the people before it is sent up to be ratified by the ambassadors of the sovereign States. [Laughter.] Yet that duty under the Constitution is the duty we propose to neglect; that is the duty which we propose to turn over to somebody else; and we are to do this because the gentleman from Mississippi has received some letters urging haste in the disposal of this matter. Right it is that there should be haste, but not haste in the tribunal which represents the people.

Further than that, to show the tendency of Democratic concentration and control, it is provided—the gentleman from Mississippi will correct me if I am wrong—it is provided in the pending order that this bill shall not be considered under the five-minute rule—shall not be considered under the rule which enables members to offer amendments to each section. On the contrary (am I right?), the bill is to be read as a whole and is then to be open to amendment in all its parts.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I was going to suggest that.

Mr. REED. It is to be read as a whole and then to be open for amendment in all its parts.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly. That was the provision of the order in reference to the McKinley bill.

Mr. REED. Precisely; but you are no more in favor of that now than you ever were; are you?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am no more in favor of the McKinley bill than I ever was.

Mr. REED. Of course not. Why, sir, I can remember when Mr. Blount, then "paramount" among the Democracy of the House, as he has since been "paramount" in foreign parts [laughter], rifted the atmosphere with his representative cries upon that subject. But that is not argument. That is a very pleasant reproach; but it is no argument. I purpose to address myself to the merits of the matter and to show why this is an unsuitable method of proceeding upon such a bill as this. This, being a bill that is new in every detail, is precisely the bill for which the rules of the House, without change ever since it began to do business, requires consideration by paragraphs. Now, why has this been so? Why was a member allowed to offer amendments to each paragraph? Simply because the Committee of the Whole was the most democratic part of the democratic assembly. Each member was to have his right, and nobody could abridge it; and under our rules nobody can abridge it. The member's right to debate may be taken away from him, but his right to offer an amendment to each paragraph as it comes up is a right of which he can not be deprived and never has been.

Mr. CATCHINGS. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Did every man who had an amendment which he desired to have voted on have an opportunity to offer it and have it voted on when the McKinley bill was under consideration?

Mr. REED. He did not; and the lesson to be drawn from that example is precisely what I am presenting to the House to-day.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman another question: whether about two hundred proposed amendments did not remain unacted on when we voted finally on the McKinley bill?

Mr. REED. Precisely. I am glad to have the gentleman afford that information; for it enables us to see what we are coming to. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for showing how such a proceeding works in practice.

Mr. CATCHINGS. You are now criticising the proceeding?

Mr. REED. I am now criticising a procedure by which you are trying to imitate what when the McKinley bill was up you condemned. I had hoped to hear you get up and apologize for what you have been doing, or at least that you would, as you have been doing in this Congress and the last, apologize silently.

Mr. CATCHINGS. We have not apologized at all.

Mr. REED. No; I know you have not got up and said so; but then imitation, my friend, is the sincerest form of flattery. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like to ask my friend another question.

Mr. REED. Let me resume my argument, as I have but five minutes. But I yield to my friend from Mississippi, of course.

Mr. CATCHINGS. By no means; I will not take the gentleman's time.

Mr. REED. The point I make is that now you have the whole bill in front of you. What are you to expect? Have you any right, as a member of this House, to offer an amendment to that bill? Not at all. You are, each and every one of you, going to be dependent for recognition on whomsoever the Speaker shall put into the chair to preside in committee.

There is not a single one going to get an opportunity to offer an amendment except by the consent of the gentleman who is to preside over the Committee of the Whole. You are putting yourselves in his power absolutely, entirely, completely; and, yet methinks, this is the body, this is the set of men who are earnest and anxious for "debate," for "opportunities for discussion;" who were against having people "crowded out," as they were in the bad old times. [Laughter.] And here you are. Now, do you want to do it?

I do not appeal to you to stand by any former position which you took. That is optional with you. If you are satisfied from your own reasoning that you were then wrong it is a handsome thing not only for you to imitate us, but to say so openly, as the gentleman from Mississippi has declined to do.

But are you satisfied you were wrong? Are you satisfied that this is the right method for disposing of your power? For let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, you are the depositories of power. The right you have to act as members of this House arises from the Constitution of the United States, and the duties which are entailed upon you come from the same source. Among those duties is the duty of preparing such a revenue bill as will be satisfactory to the people whom you represent.

Unless you do that you do not perform your duty; and the Constitution has so strenuously imposed that duty upon you alone that, until you act, the Senate of the United States can not so much as stir a finger. If this House intends to be jealous of its honor and of its prerogatives it will take such care, not as anybody else took, but as commends itself to the wisdom and the judgment and the sense of the members, who are responsible for their actions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Maine will occupy the remainder of his time so that I may close the debate. I prefer that.

Mr. REED. I think I will retain my two minutes. If necessary to say anything I will close the discussion.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I prefer that the gentleman should exhaust his time now. I have a right to close.

Mr. REED. Well, I do not suppose the gentleman has actually the right, for I may retain my two minutes and use it or not, as I see proper.

But I will take the two minutes to add simply this: That I trust if this thing is adopted the right of recognition may sacredly depend upon the judgment of the Chair, and may not be the subject of—ah—anything else. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Maine, who has just spoken, that whatever was done in the Fifty-first Congress in the consideration and passage of the McKinley bill is not necessarily persuasive, and does not necessarily excuse similar action by this House in the consideration of the bill now to be brought before us. It is our duty to have the bill brought before the House in such way that it shall have sufficient consideration under the rule for general debate, and that it shall have sufficient consideration under the rule for five-minutes debate, and that the members of the House who desire to do so shall have ample opportunity to present their amendments and have those amendments acted upon in the Committee of the Whole.

The rule proposed does not take away or abridge any of these necessary and proper rights. No men can be more interested in having this bill properly considered by the House, both under the general and the five-minutes debate, or in having the members of this body granted full opportunity to have their amendments offered and acted upon by the committee than those who have been charged with the duty of the preparation of the bill.

It did seem to us, after consultation with a very large number of our fellow-members, that the rule as originally presented by the Committee on Rules secured all of those rights. It proposed to give five days for general debate; it proposed to give twelve days for debate on the items of the bill; it proposed to begin the present week with night sessions for general debate, so that there could be no part of the bill and no item in it that might not have sufficient and instructive discussion in this House and before the country.

If two days of that time have been lost, the responsibility for that loss does not rest with those who were seeking to bring this bill before the House. But, sir, I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, that we shall throw even upon those who are responsible for it the loss of this time. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, that there shall be any abridgment of the time to be given to general debate because of this loss, and I shall ask the House, before it takes the final vote upon this rule, to adopt, by unanimous consent, the amendments which I shall propose, first, that all of the present week, six days instead of five, as proposed in the original rule, shall be given to general debate; that beginning with to-night there may be, and if the members desire it there shall be, regular night sessions for general debate; that after the lapse of the present week, beginning with Monday morning of next week, debate shall begin upon the bill under the five-minute rule, and that the bill shall be put forward two weeks from that time, the 29th instead of the 25th, as proposed in the rule. [Applause.] And I shall also ask that the proposition of the rule allowing the privilege to print shall be incorporated also; provided, however, that the privilege shall end with the termination of the debate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for an agreement to these amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent that the order be modified so that the whole of this week may be given to general debate; that there be night sessions, beginning with to-night, and that the two weeks following shall be given to debate under the five-minute rule, with evening sessions for general debate, and that the vote be taken on Monday, the 29th, instead of Thursday, the 25th. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to any enlargement of debate, but I do not want, by my consent, to be supposed to admit that that leaves the thing in the proper shape, because we do not assent to it with any such proposition. We simply find ourselves in a minority at last.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. We do not ask the gentleman's assent to the rule, but that gentlemen assent to these proposed amendments to the rule.

Mr. REED. Whatever rule you gentlemen make up, you make up on your own responsibility. I am going to ask the House to recommit with instructions, if we are to be allowed that opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Before that, then, is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the further request suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], that this leave to print be construed to extend only up to and including the day of the passage of the bill, if it is passed; that it shall not extend indefinitely, but that gentlemen desiring to avail themselves of the leave to print must do so before or by the time the bill passes the House, should it pass?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that might be extended to one month after the passage of the bill. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] It will necessitate a great deal of labor on the part of members to prepare remarks for printing, when they will naturally desire to devote their time to attendance upon the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. REED. Before that consent is given I want to suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]—does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] purpose to occupy an hour after the previous question is ordered, to close the debate on the bill?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That will depend entirely upon developments during the debate. I reserve the right to do that.

Mr. REED. I desire, if that is the case, that we may be allowed an hour and a half prior to that.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I understand that there is always an arrangement of that kind, by which the minority and the majority can close the debate.

Mr. REED. If that is the understanding, it is satisfactory.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I would not make any understanding——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that it might be agreed that on the 29th, before the vote is taken, each side shall have one hour for debate in the House. That would cover it.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I shall not object to that.

Mr. REED. That covers the right of the gentleman to close.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, that will be the understanding, that there shall be one hour of debate on each side in the House on Monday, the 29th, before the vote is taken. The Chair understands the modification of the order to have been agreed to. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desires to make a motion, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SPRINGER. The agreement just made does not include my proposition with reference to extending the leave to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that leave to print be extended thirty days after the passage of the bill. [Cries of "No!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will say ten days. Members will not know the shape the bill is in on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his proposition so as to make it ten days.

Mr. CALDWELL and others. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine desires to submit a motion.

Mr. REED. I desire to submit a motion at the proper time to recommit this order.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear what is proceeding.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. BOATNER. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BOATNER. A number of gentlemen desire to know whether this bill is to be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, read by sections, in order that amendments may be offered when the section is considered?

The SPEAKER. Under the order, on the first day of its consideration under the five-minute rule, the bill is to be read through, and then for two weeks amendments are in order to any paragraph of the bill.

Mr. BOATNER. There is nothing in the rule that will guarantee a vote on any amendment offered to any paragraph in the bill.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing to prevent the committee from coming to a vote whenever it desires to do so.

Mr. REED. We saw that when the act of 1890 was reported to the House there were two hundred amendments, upon none of which could a vote be taken.

Mr. OATES. I desire further information. I desire to know if the bill will be read by sections in the usual way, and amendments offered and disposed of and the sections not recurred to, or will it be in order to offer amendments to any part of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order to offer amendments to any part of the bill.

A MEMBER. At any time?

The SPEAKER. At any time when a gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. That was not my understanding of the matter. Do I understand that the bill is not going to be taken up by paragraphs and considered open to amendments, but that the whole bill is to be read and then anyone can offer any amendments to any portion of it and consume the whole time on that?

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the order that provides for consuming the whole time on any amendment. The order provides that when general debate has expired, which, under the order as it has been amended will be on next Monday, on that day the bill shall be read through entirely.

Mr. BURROWS. Before any amendments are offered.

The SPEAKER. Before any amendments are offered; and then that any amendment is in order to any part of the bill, and not to the paragraphs as read in the usual order.

Mr. BURROWS. Then we could take up any part of the bill, such as the administration features of the bill, and spend all the time on it.

The SPEAKER. Any part.

Mr. BURROWS. Any amendment offered will be debated for five minutes for or against; and then, no matter what it may be, for instance, it may be the administrative portion of the bill, which comes last, and any amendment can be offered; at the very first opportunity a gentleman may rise and such time as the House finds necessary or the committee finds necessary to consume in it can be occupied, and then another section of the administration bill can be taken up, and so on, according to recognition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is right.

Mr. REED. It is to correct that that I desire to offer this proposition.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose that twenty amendments accumulate on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. They can not. Under the rules of the House but four amendments can be pending at one time. An amendment, an amendment to that amendment, an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. PICKLER. And by this means the whole two weeks can be occupied.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the committee does not vote them out of the way; but the committee can vote them out of the way, and, under the rule, ought to vote them out of the way. When five minutes' debate has been had for and against them it is the rule of the House that they shall be voted upon. The practice has extended it furthur, but the rule does not authorize it.

Mr. REED. These amendments can be offered in detail, and when one lot is disposed of another series can be offered.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I want to make another suggestion. Would not the Committee on Rules have the right of way at all times, under the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the practice of the House is to consider first the amendments offered to the bill by the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. REED. That is the practice of the House, as they did in the case of the act of 1890.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. They asked the consent of the committee, and that consent was granted.

Mr. REED. They would have control by general law.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; the Committee of the Whole would have control. Gentlemen are arguing the question as if the Committee of the Whole can not be trusted to take care of itself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has a motion.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is so much confusion that we can not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. [After a pause.] Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desire to submit a motion?

Mr. REED. The proposition which I desire to submit, Mr. Speaker, if this is the proper time, is to recommit with instructions to report an order for consideration which will give more time for general debate or more time for debate, because I do not care to make general debate the principal question; I only think that there ought to be some time for debate. I will therefore move that the order be recommitted with instructions to report an order for consideration which will give more days for debate and reserve the right to amend each paragraph as it is reached in reading.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to move to recommit a proposition to amend the rules? Under the rule the Chair is to entertain but one dilatory motion, the motion to adjourn, and it seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is not in order. The pending proposition is in the nature of a motion to suspend the rules; it is a suspension of certain rules and the adoption of another rule in their place, and I hold that a motion to recommit with instructions is not allowable upon a proposition of this kind. I do not remember any case where a motion to amend the rules, or to suspend the rules—and this, I repeat, is in the nature of a motion to suspend the rules—has been held to be subject to a motion to recommit with instructions. A bill is subject to that motion on its final passage, but not a proposition like this.

Mr. REED. It is subject to every motion. It is a proceeding of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is subject to all the motions that are allowed under the rules, but under the rule the Chair is to entertain but one motion—a motion to adjourn.

Mr. REED. But the Chair has already entertained a motion for the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course. That is in order.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course. That is a motion to cut off debate.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Illinois will see at once that saying "Of course" does not answer the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, the motion for the previous question is a motion that is allowed for the purpose of cutting off debate. There would be no end of debate unless the previous question could be ordered. But, upon a proposition to suspend the rules or to change the rules, as in this case, which is the same thing as suspending the rules, only one motion can be entertained, which is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. REED. The gentleman will see that that can not possibly be so——

The SPEAKER (interposing). The Chair would not hold this motion to be dilatory. The rule provides that but one motion to adjourn shall be entertained, and no other dilatory motion, but the Chair would not hold this to be a dilatory motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair entertained two motions to adjourn yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REED moves to recommit with intructions to report an order of consideration, which will give more days for debate, and reserve the right to amend each paragraph as it is reached in reading.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 174.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 6, nays 184, not voting 161; as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WYLIE BAILEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case Wylie Bailey against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DENNIS M'INTYRE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting the papers in the claim of Dennis McIntyre, postmaster at Mackinac Island, Mich., for losses sustained by burglary; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL CODAY, SR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Samuel Coday, sr., against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to promote the administration of justice in the Army, submitted by the Acting Judge-Advocate-General of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of the names of the clerks and other employés of the War Department and its offices from December, 1892, to November 30, 1893, and showing the time each was actually employed and the sums paid to each; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. HEARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and accompanying papers, relative to the claim of JOHN T. HEARD for services rendered to Western Cherokee Indians in their claim against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LAWS AND JOURNALS OF NEW MEXICO LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two copies of the laws and journals of the Thirteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct, if there be no objection, that the books accompanying this paper be filed in the library of the Hall of the House.

There was no objection.

R. S. PERKINS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of R. S. Perkins vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

FORD THEATER BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting sundry resolutions on the condition of the Ford Theater building, and calling attention to the necessity of providing quarters for the Record and Pension Division of the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE COMPANIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That line 22, on page 2, of the bill (H. R. 3289), entitled "An act to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey," as enrolled by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, consisting of the following words, namely, "and, provided further, That nothing in this act," which words were included in said bill by error in the conference report, be, and the same are hereby, stricken from said bill, and said bill is directed to be enrolled without said line and words.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this a correction simply in accordance with the agreement of the conference committee?

The SPEAKER. It seems that some surplus language found its way into the bill. The Clerk will report the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That nothing in this act.

The SPEAKER. These words seem to have been erroneously inserted.

Mr. DINGLEY. On the part of the enrolling clerks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The resolution shows that it was by an error in the conference committee.

Without objection, the resolution will be concurred in.

There was no objection.

DISQUALIFICATION OF REGISTERS AND RECEIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2796) relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification.

The SPEAKER. This bill is reported from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. McRAE. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 2796) entitled "An act relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualifications" do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That no register or receiver shall receive evidence in, hear or determine any cause pending in any district land office in which cause he is interested directly or indirectly, or has been of counsel, or where he is related to any of the parties in interest by consanguinity or affinity within the fourth degree, computing by the rules adopted by the common law.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of every register or receiver so disqualified to report the fact of his disqualification to the Commissioner of the General Land Office as soon as he shall ascertain it and before the hearing of such cause, who thereupon, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall designate some other register, receiver, or special agent of the Land Department to act in the place of the disqualified officer, and the same authority is conferred on the officer so designated which such register or receiver would otherwise have possessed as to any such cause."

Mr. McRAE. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that this is an entirely new bill. Will the gentleman please explain the changes made in the House bill?

Mr. McRAE. While it would appear to be an entirely new bill, in fact it is not.

The only difference between the House bill and the Senate amendment is this: That in section 1 of the House bill it was provided that parties in interest might waive this disqualification. That is not allowed by the Senate amendment. The second section of the bill as it passed the House provided for the pay of the actual expense of the officer designed to act. The Senate have reported these changes in the shape of one amendment, I suppose for convenience; but this is the only difference between the two Houses on this question.

The question being taken on concurring in the Senate amendment, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UMATILLA IRRIGATION COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 738) extending the time allowed the Umatilla Irrigation Company for the construction of its ditch across the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the Speaker's table for the present, as a similar bill is about to be reported from the House committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN W. LEWIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 71) for the relief of John W. Lewis, of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DAVID B. GOTTWALS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 439) for the relief of David B. Gottwals.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, as this bill is simply to cure a defect in the title of property here, I will ask unanimous consent that it be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia, heretofore purchased by and conveyed to David B. Gottwals, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from all forfeitures heretofore incurred by the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. LEWIS.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, just a moment ago a bill for the relief of John W. Lewis, of Oregon, was reported and no response made. I ask that it be permitted to lie upon the Speaker's table pending a report from the Committee on Claims on a similar bill.

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask that it be allowed to lie upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 71) for the relief of John W. Lewis, of Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [M. HERMANN] asks that this bill may lie upon the Speaker's table temporarily, stating that a similar bill is before the Committee on Claims. Without objection the bill will temporarily lie upon the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRICKNER, for ten days, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. HATCH, indefinitely, on account of serious illness.

To Mr. HARRIS, for two weeks, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. PENCE, indefinitely, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. GRAHAM, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WOLVERTON, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CORNISH, until Wednesday, on account of important business.

To Mr. GARDNER, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CADMUS, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. COBB of Alabama, for five days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MEREDITH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Martha F. Dickinson, there being no adverse report thereon.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. A reprint is asked of the bill (H. R. 4568) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of fraud in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof. It is stated that the print of this bill has been exhausted. Without objection a reprint will be ordered.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MARSHALL, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 71) for the relief of purchasers of timber and stone lands under the act of June 3, 1878.

COMMITTEE REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The committees were called for reports; when bills of the following titles were severally reported, read a first and second time, referred to the Calendars named below, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

RECOGNIZANCES, ETC.

R. 4568) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of fraud in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof—ordered to be printed.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. CARUTH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back favorably, with amendment, the bill (H. R. 2795) to amend section 5 of the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to organize the Life-Saving Service;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SWAMP-LAND GRANTS.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the bill H. R. 5065 as a substitute for the bill H. R. 3610, to ratify the reservation of certain lands made for the benefit of Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill (H. R. 3610) was ordered to lie on the table.

EXTENDING TIME FOR FINAL PROOF AND PAYMENT UNDER THE PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably, with amendment, the bill (H. R. 3458) extending the time for final proof and payment on lands claimed under the public land laws of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for reports. In accordance with the rule just adopted, the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4864.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 4864) raising revenue. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from West Virginia desires more than an hour, I hope the committee will grant him the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia be allowed to proceed without limit. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. WILSON of West Virginia addressed the Committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from West Virginia is very much fatigued by the exertion that is necessary in making so long an address, if he will yield I will move that the committee rise, which will give him an opportunity to speak under less adverse circumstances.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) reducing taxation and to raise revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is ready to make a report on the writ given him, the Chair understands.

The Sergeant-at-Arms [Mr. Snow] appeared at the bar of the House.

Mr. SNOW (the Sergeant-at-Arms). Mr. Speaker, by virtue of the writ of the House, directed to me, I have to submit a written report, which I hand to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms in execution of the writ of the House.

The report was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,

Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] this morning stated that he was present on Saturday on the roll call, and the correction was made in the Journal; therefore the gentleman's name will be stricken from the writ, without objection. It ought not to have been placed there.

The Chair desires to state as to one or two of these gentlemen, that perhaps the Chair has been at fault. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CORNISH] on Friday evening requested that the Chair present an application for a leave of absence for him until Monday. It escaped the memory of the Chair entirely. It was not the fault of the gentleman from New Jersey, but the fault of the Chair. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GEISSENHAINER] telegraphed for a leave to attend the funeral of a friend, and that was not presented to the House through the fault of the Chair. It was an oversight.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], who is not now in the House, being too unwell to remain, requested the Chair to state that he was absent by leave of the House, and as soon as he heard of the revocation of the leaves by the House, last Thursday or Friday, whenever it was, he started back. He has gone out of the House now because he was too unwell to remain.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order that under the rule he would be excusable; he would have the right to come in.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, I insist that, inasmuch as he is under the writ, does not that require some action on the part of the House?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I was about to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] was here, and requested that the Chair make the statement that he was too unwell to remain.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The object of the resolution having been accomplished, if it is not objectionable I will move that all gentlemen named by the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms be discharged from custody and excused.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order can be made. Without objection that order will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to state that I have seen it in several newspapers that I was one of the delinquents. I was absent with the leave of the House in the first place, and I was absent at home, detained by sickness in my family. As soon as I could leave the sick bed in my family I came to Washington.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that the Journal discloses the fact that the gentleman had leave of absence on account of sickness in his family. In first making out the list of absentees that excuse was not discovered, but before the writ was issued it was discovered and the gentleman's name was not included.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before that is entertained I desire to withdraw the motion to adjourn, as I understand there are several gentlemen who desire to speak to-night under the order made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as I see that my name has been published in several papers among the names of members absent without leave, I desire to state that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 21, page 453, there appears an announcement that I was excused indefinitely on account of sickness. Being excused, I left Washington before the House took the holiday recess and went home. I returned as soon as my condition would permit, and when I received the notification of the Sergeant-at-Arms I was already on my way back to this city. I want to state further, that during the extra session I came here on the 7th day of August and did not miss a single roll call or a single vote during the whole of that session.

After the adjournment I went home and returned on the first day of the regular session, and did not miss a single vote or a single roll call until the day before the House took a recess for the holidays, when, as I have already stated, having obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness, I went home and returned as soon as I was able. Let me add that I have never absented myself or refused to vote for the purpose of breaking a quorum, that I am here to do all I can to help the Democratic party to redeem the pledges they have made to the people, and that I object to being published as an absentee when in fact I was absent by leave of the House on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that while his statement as to his leave of absence is correct, yet on last Thursday all leaves of absence were revoked by the House.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I telegraphed to my colleague [Mr. LATIMER] to have my leave of absence extended, and he put a written request to that effect upon the desk, but for some reason it was not presented.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments:

Mr. HOUK of Ohio as a member of the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. JONES of Virginia as a member of the Committee on Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The order adopted to-day provides that at half past 5 o'clock the House shall take a recess until 8 p. m., the evening session to be devoted to debate only upon the pending bill; and also that during the operation of the order the House shall meet daily at 11 a. m. The Chair understands that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has not concluded his remarks, and calls the attention of members to the fact that the House will meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, when the gentleman from West Virginia will continue his speech.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from West Virginia, then, will not proceed this evening?

The SPEAKER. Not this evening. The Chair is informed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole that arrangements have been made for certain other gentlemen to speak at the evening session.

Mr. BURROWS. The evening session is for debate only?

The SPEAKER. For debate only upon the pending bill; and if there be no objection, instead of waiting until half past 5, the Chair will now declare the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

There was no objection, and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock) took a recess until 8 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at 8 p. m., the Speaker in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The SPEAKER. The House is in session for debate only on the bill the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, more than a year ago the Democratic party in its national platform, at Chicago, made the following declaration, which I select as my text on the present occasion. It reads as follows:

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered. We denounce the McKinley tariff law enacted by the Fifty-first Congress as the culminating atrocity of class legislation. We indorse the effort made by the Democrats of the present Congress to modify its most oppressive features in the direction of free raw materials and cheaper manufactured goods that enter into general consumption, and we promise its repeal as one of the beneficent results that will follow the action of the people in intrusting power to the Democratic party.

Since the McKinley tariff went into operation there have been ten reductions of the wages of laboring men to one increase. We deny that there has been any increase of prosperity to the country since the tariff went into operation, and we point to the dullness and distress, the wage reductions and strikes in the iron trade, as positive evidence that no such prosperity has resulted from the McKinley act. We call attention of thoughtful Americans to the fact that after thirty years of restrictive taxes against the importation of foreign wealth in exchange for our agricultural surplus the homes of the farmers of the country have become burdened with real-estate mortgage debt of over $2,500,000,000, exclusive of all other forms of indebtedness. That in one of the chief agricultural States of the West there appears a real-estate mortgage debt averaging $165 per capita of the total population, and that similar conditions and tendencies are shown to exist in other agricultural exporting States. We denounce a policy which fosters no industry so much as it does that of the sheriff.

In one of the most memorable campaigns ever conducted in this country, after a full and exhaustive discussion last fall a year ago, the foregoing sentiment and declaration of principles were indorsed by 5,554,267 votes of American freemen, and the present Administration went into power pledged to this doctrine. This Congress is now assembled for the purpose of crystallizing this idea into law and to change a system that has for nearly thirty years robbed the masses of the American people for the benefit of the classes. The language used in the platform is plain and unambiguous, and the people understood the effect of their action. The five million and a half of voters who cast their ballots for the Democratic party solemnly placed themselves on record in favor of the abandonment of this false doctrine of protection.

And now, Mr. Chairman, it seems almost useless to consume the time of the House in going over the ground again. But the report of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means on the bill under consideration is filed, as it were, in the nature of a motion for a new trial, and with the usual audacity of error insists that the American people were mistaken in their action on the great question and that the proposition be resubmitted to them for their further consideration. The momentous issue may safely be intrusted in their hands. We read in Holy Writ that "The dog turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire," but it can not be presumed that a people who have just beheld the "promised land" and the dawn of industrial liberty will again return to Egyptian bondage, "to make bricks even without straw" for the millionaires of this country. Republican protection is the great fraud of this or any other age and the most pronounced misnomer of all languages.

It is a living falsehood now known and read by all intelligent laborers in this country from center to circumference. Triumphant wrong has never yet challenged the attention of mankind without awakening a spirit that ultimately proved unconquerable. Republican protection, which makes wrong a virtue and proclaims iniquity as its highest and noblest aspiration, has deliberately led to its own destruction. The object and purpose of all protective tariffs is the taxation of one man for the benefit of another. Every intelligent voter now knows that this is robbery, and why not call it robbery as is done in the platform? This robbery is defended by its friends by the impudent statement that it is beneficial to all, in this: that it raises the wages of labor; that it preserves the home market to the farmers; that it rests only on the foreigner; that it makes things cheap, and by the worse than infamous blasphemy, that but for this protective system we would have no prosperity or happiness in this country. Every voter knows that this is false, and at the election in 1892 more than 5,000,000 of votes were so recorded with the names and residence of the electors. This falsehood must be battered down and its shameful injustice made known to the world.

Under the tariff of 1883 the average rate was 47 per cent on all imported goods, but in 1890, a year of profound peace, and no increased demand for a national increase of revenue, by the McKinley bill the average duty was raised to 62 per cent, and on some articles being entirely prohibitory. The total value of imports into this country for the year 1892 was $827,402,462. Of this amount $396,402,804 was dutiable, and the balance, $457,999,658, was on the free list. The amount of customs duty collected for the year 1892 was $177,452,964.15, and from internal revenue the amount collected was $153,971,072.52. The amount of exports from this country in 1893 was $1,015,732,011, of which nearly 80 per cent was farm products. The amount of duty collected in 1893 was $203,355,016.73, and for internal revenue $161,027,623.93. Of this vast sum of $203,355,016.73, the farmers and laborers paid the greater part as the necessaries of life, and the articles used by the poor are to-day taxed nearly double as much as luxuries and articles used by the rich.

The McKinley bill was passed as claimed by its authors to protect the American people from the importation of the cheap pauper manufactured goods of foreign nations. For this ostensible purpose, therefore, the American people were compelled to pay the import duty which I have mentioned of $203,355,016.73. This vast sum was paid by the American people. It may at first have been paid by the importers, but it was finally paid by the consumers, and in the final adjustment of accounts it was paid by the farmers and laborers of this country, for in the end labor pays all taxes. Nearly all this vast sum was a protective tax, and the tax on articles consumed by the poor was nearly double the tax on articles used by the rich. In framing the McKinley bill the duty was laid on such articles as could be or were manufactured in this country, and such as could not were placed on the free list, and in the case of sugar a bounty was given to the producers of domestic sugar. So I am warranted in the statement that this gigantic sum of $203,355,016.73 was levied for the purpose of protection—the revenue being simply an incident.

The purpose and effect of all protective tariffs is to raise the price of goods imported so that they can not be sold in competition with domestic manufactured articles. A tariff is laid for revenue or protection, or it may be for both. A revenue tariff would be a just tariff if luxuries were taxed higher than the necessaries of life for the reason that the money would go into the public Treasury to pay the expenses of the Government, and it is supported by constitutional authority. A tariff for protection is laid upon the people for the benefit of a few and is without constitutional authority and therefore void, as there is no law to support it; hence it is robbery plain and simple. A protective tax is unjust because it is paid by the people, not for a public purpose, not to support the Government or to pay its debts, but to enrich the manufacturers.

This was the crime that brought about the Reign of Terror in France, more than a hundred years ago, when French manufacturers and aristocracy scoffed at all warnings and drank, laughed, danced, and collected their robber tariff from the people until public indignation gathered like a volcano, and, finally bursting forth, setting the guillotine at work upon the necks of the nobility. It was this nefarious protective policy that caused the prayer of millions in England to ascend to Heaven in vain for so many years for daily bread, and relief only came when the torch of the mob lit up the lurid sky and the cry of the multitude shook the very foundation of the House of Parliament itself, and it was then, and not till then, that Sir Robert Peel determined to give England the cheap loaf, which act was the crowning glory of his whole public career. As a matter of course, it is claimed by the tariff robbers that they share their plunder with the farmers and laborers of this country, but that falsehood has been exploded a thousand times, and still the assertion is renewed.

The same claim was made in England and France when successful tariff robbery was carried on for generations, but the people finally unmasked the villainy and caused the oppressors to apologize for their oppressions.

This protective tariff is the same everywhere the world over. There is but one fact about protection, and that fact is immutable and certain, and it is that this form of protection is robbery, injustice, and oppression.

The root of the protective abomination is the taxation of the one man for the benefit of another, and always the taxation of the poor for the benefit of the rich. Taxation reaches down to the base of society, and in the end labor pays all. The protective tariff stands as the most abhorrent work of class legislation, and sooner or later the just sense of all nations must revolt against it.

The robber tariff lives on lies and fattens on falsehood. It justifies plunder and stigmatizes the people who dare to enter a protest against it as free traders and enemies of free government. On its lying tongue words are made to change their meaning, and it has made right a wrong and has branded truth as a falsehood. Under its false assumption of protection it has driven hundreds to starvation and thousands of honest laboring men to the poorhouse. Its teachings, that a people can become rich by taxing themselves, are dishonest and pernicious. It is a justification to every thief, robber, burglar, bandit, and freebooter in the country. If the tariff law justifies the rich in robbing the farmer, why not also justify the poor in robbing the rich.

What a dreadful example this iniquitous protective system sets our young and rising generation. It teaches that it is better to be dishonest so you are rich than to be honest and poor. It sets aside the teachings of the fathers of the Republic, that exact justice was always the best hope of mankind. It sets aside the principle that labor alone produces wealth, and teaches men to come to Congress, as they have done, to secure the passage of a law by which they secure a license to rob their neighbors.

The McKinley bill was so framed. The ready-made clothing business asked for a tax, and they got what they asked, from 100 to 300 per cent. The iron industry asked for a tax, and it was given, from 50 to 75 per cent; and so with the other industries of the country. They made their own demand on Congress and it was granted by McKinley and his cohorts. This is proven by the report of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee and a comparison of the McKinley bill. This was all explained in the debate on the McKinley bill by gentlemen who were then of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I see it referred to now in the report of the majority on the bill under discussion. It was a deliberate plan to allow the manufacturers to rob the people.

When Cæsar led his victorious army across the Rubicon and finally destroyed the liberties of his country, in order to secure the present and future support of his leading generals he divided a part of the plunder of war among them. And so the Republican party, in order to secure the support of millionaire manufacturers of this country in each returning election and to obtain the money to corrupt the voters of the country gave them permission to write the McKinley bill that authorized them to rob the farmers and laborers of this country in a single year of more than a billion of dollars—more than was ever divided among any gang of thieves or robbers since the dawn of creation. There may be some legal differences between Cæsarism and McKinleyism, but morally there is none at all. A tariff for protection has always been a robber system. It derives its name from the pirate Tarifa and a town and castle called after him located at the Strait of Gibraltar, where the Moorish pirates for a number of years in the eight centuries of the Mohammedan sway in Spain exacted tribute from every vessel entering or leaving the Mediterranean.

A certain part of the value of every cargo was taken by the robbers (history does not inform us, however, whether the robbery was ad valorem or specific), but the crime was tamely submitted to by the nations of Europe rather than be at the trouble and expense of hanging the tariff robbers. History, however, informs us that the owners of the cargoes of the ships so robbed by tariff thieves lost nothing by the robbery, for they simply added the value of the stolen goods to the value of the remainder, and the consumer in purchasing the remaining goods paid the value of the articles stolen as well as those he received. It was then, as it is to-day, the consumer paid the tariff as well as the price of the goods.

It may not be just to hold the word tariff responsible for its antecedents, and after all there may be nothing in a name. "That which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," but in this case the name has adhered to the thing with great pertinacity if there is no kinship between them. Whatever else may be said of the tariff it is true to its history in one sense at least, that it always takes, but never gives; it always levies, but never contributes. It had its origin in crime, and it is a crime to-day. Any and every private interest in a public tax is a crime against liberty and against organized society. All of the collateral tariff infamies hang upon this one offense. Put an end to this feature of it and all danger will fade away, and it will then deprive no honest man unlawfully of anything that belongs to him.

The whole protection system is but a monstrous bribe. It is a bribe paid to Massachusetts and Pennsylvania for their support of the Republican party, the money to pay the bribe being stolen from the people of the West and South. The money is used to buy corporations, individuals, and the entire votes of a State. The system begins with bribery and is sustained by it, and its most notable triumphs are won by the use of money wrung from honest labor. In the language of the Chicago platform, "the McKinley bill is the culminating atrocity of class legislation and should be repealed."

A protective tariff as manifested in McKinleyism is the direst curse that ever damned the American people. It violates international law, human and divine, by prohibiting trade among the families of men, thus denying the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. It has driven industry to want, beggary, and starvation; it has forced virtue dressed in rags to insanity; it has driven mothers with their infants at their breasts from the cottage hearth starving into the winter's blast and denied to the husband and father work necessary to support his family; it has made thousands of millionaires and millions of tramps—both a curse to society; it has filled prisons with criminals and the churches with hypocrites; it has driven millions of honest laborers to the soup houses to be fed in the name of charity with the products of their own labor, out of which they were robbed; it makes merchandise of men, slaves of women, beggars of children, and outcasts of all, and then retains power by bribery and fraud. It is the author of all the sweating systems in the world, where women and children sweat blood to be coined into money to satisfy the greed of Mammon, and it forges the promise of God into a lie, and we do see the seed of the righteous "begging bread," the divine promise to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, this is the indictment which was presented against the Republican party by the grand jury of the country and upon which it has been tried and convicted.

The first point made is that there is

NO CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TO IMPOSE A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

This proposition is asserted in our platform. The Constitution reads as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

In the interpretation of this clause of the Constitution the emphases are to be placed on the words "to pay the debts," and in this way to provide for the common defense and general welfare. If the section should receive any other interpretation than this it would not be a government of limited powers, but Congress would have unlimited power to levy a tax for anything that Congress might consider for the general welfare; which is not true.

The power of taxation is the greatest power exercised by any government; for the power to tax is the power to destroy. Every government must have the power of taxation, for without that power it can not exist. But in all free governments there must be a limit on the taxing power. If not it would simply be a monarchy. A tariff is a tax and therefore comes within the meaning of the Constitution mentioned. What, then, are taxes? Taxes are defined to be "the enforced proportional contribution from persons and property levied by the State by virtue of its sovereignty for support of government and for all public needs." A tax can only be levied for public purposes. A protective tariff being for the benefit of a certain industry which is private, is not within the meaning of the law and is therefore null and void. This being mainly a legal question, I wish to call the attention of the House to the law on this point as announced by the writers on elementary law as well as the adjudication of the courts of last resort in this country, State and national. Burroughs on Taxation, on page 6, states the law to be "that taxes can only be imposed for a public purpose; they can not be imposed for a private purpose."

Cooley on Taxation, page 55, states the law to be as follows:

It is the first requisite of lawful taxation that the purpose for which it is laid shall be a public purpose.

The same author, on page 126 of his book, says:

However important it may be to the community that industrial citizens should prosper in their industrial enterprises, it is not the business of government to aid them with its means. Enlightened states, while giving all necessary protection to their citizens, will leave everyone to depend for his success and prosperity in business on his own exertions, in the belief that by doing so his own industry will be more certainly enlisted, and his prosperity and happiness more probably secured.

It may therefore be safely asserted that taxation for the purpose of raising money from the public to be given or even loaned to private parties in order that they may use it in their individual business enterprises, is not recognized as an employment of the power for a public use. In contemplation of law it would be taking the common property of the whole community and handing it over to private parties for their private gain and consequently unlawful. Any incidental benefits to the public that might flow from it would not support it as legitimate taxation.

Hilliard on Taxation, page 12, affirms the law to be as follows:

Taxation is allowable only for public purposes.

The text-books all read one way, and I will now call your attention to the adjudication of the courts.

I find in a note to volume 16, American States Reports, a very valuable compilation of the authorities on this point, which has greatly aided me and from which I have selected most of the following cases, and I will now read them to the House. In 58 California Reports, 639, the court says:

To promote a public purpose by a tax levy upon the property in the State is within the power of the Legislature; but the Legislature has no power to impose taxes for the benefit of individuals connected with a private enterprise, even though the private enterprise might benefit the local public in a remote or collateral way.

In 27 Iowa Reports, 46, the supreme court of that State say:

Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the Legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes or to accomplish some governmental end. A tax for a private purpose is a solecism in language.

In 9 Kansas Reports, 689, it is said:

Taxation to aid ordinary manufactures or the establishment of enterprise, is a thing until recently quite unheard of, and the power must be denied to exist unless all limits to the appropriation of private property and to the power to tax be disregarded.

The supreme court of Iowa has held that no authority or even dictum can be found which asserts that there can be any legitimate taxation, where the money to be raised does not go into the public treasury, and that the uniform weight of public authority is that taxes are to be imposed for the use of the people and not for the benefit of individuals.

In 20 Michigan Reports, 474, the supreme court of that State say in regard to taxation:

It must be imposed for a public, not for a mere private purpose. Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes only, and when it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with public interest or welfare it ceases to be taxation and becomes public plunder.

The supreme court of Maine has held:

No public exigency can require private spoliation for the private benefit of favored individuals.

It is held in 60 Maine Reports, 124, that the Legislature of the State has no power to pass a law to authorize a town to raise money either by taxation or issuing its bonds and loan the same to private parties to enable them to erect mills and manufactories in such town, thereby to increase its wealth and business as well as the accommodation of its inhabitants. Such an object is entirely a private one and in no sense entitled to be called a public use of such a character as to justify the imposition of taxes upon the inhabitants and property of a town by a vote of the majority of such town.

The court say in the closing part of the opinion in this case:

To take directly or indirectly the property of individuals to loan to others for the purpose of private gain and speculation against the consent of those whose money is thus loaned would be to withdraw it from the protection of the constitution and submit it to the will of an irresponsible majority. It would be the robbery and spoliation of those whose estate is thus confiscated. No surer or more effectual method could be devised to deter from accumulation, to diminish capital, to render property insecure, and thus to paralyze industry.

The Legislature of Massachusetts passed a statute to authorize the city of Boston to issue bonds to the amount of $20,000,000 to be loaned to the owners of land upon which buildings were destroyed by fire. Commissioners were appointed to manage the loan and took a first mortgage upon the land at less than three-fourths its value to secure the payment of the money with interest.

The supreme judicial court of that State in 111 Massachusetts, 454, unanimously held that the statute was null and void and perpetually enjoined all proceeding to collect taxes to pay such bonds.

A similar statute was passed by the Legislature of West Virginia authorizing the city of Wheeling to issue bonds and loan the money for the purpose of encouraging the establishment of manufacturing interests, and to take bonds and mortgages upon property to secure its payment, and still the Supreme Court of the United States, in 106 United States Reports, held that such a statute was utterly void. The Supreme Court say in that case:

Taxation to pay the bonds in question is not taxation for a public object. It is taxation which taxes the private property of one person for the private use of another.

In 20 Michigan, 452, the supreme court of that State say:

It is not in the power of the State, in my opinion, under the name of a bounty or under any other cover or subterfuge, to furnish the capital to set private parties up in any kind of business or to subsidize their business after they entered upon it. A bounty law of which this is the real nature is void, whatever may be the pretense on which it may be enacted.

In 21 Pennsylvania State Reports, 168, the supreme court of that State say:

Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes; when it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public it ceases to be taxation and becomes plunder.

In 24 Wisconsin Reports, 356, the supreme court of that State say in regard to taxation:

It is conceded by all that a tax must be for a public and not for a private purpose. If, therefore the Legislature attempts to take money from the people by legal compulsion for merely private purposes, that is not a tax according to the essential meaning of the word, and, therefore, such a law is not, strictly speaking, unconstitutional as being prohibited by any positive provision of the Constitution, but is void for the reason that it is beyond the scope of legislation.

The Legislature of the State of Kansas passed a law in 1872 authorizing the city of Topeka, in order to develop and improve said city, to appropriate from its general funds, or by the issuance of bonds of said city to such an amount as the city council might determine. The city issued bonds to a certain corporation to the amount of $100,000 to enable the corporation to establish a manufactory of iron bridges in that city. In 20 Wallace, 664, the Supreme Court of the United States say of this case in refusing to allow said bonds to be paid by taxation from the property of the people of that city:

Of all powers conferred on the Government that of taxation is most liable to abuse. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there are no implied limitations of the use for which the power may be exercised. To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms. Nor is it taxation. Beyond a cavil there can be no lawful taxation which is not laid for public purposes.

Mr. Chairman, many more decisions to the same effect could be cited, but I deem it unnecessary. In my examination of this question in the law library I found that the supreme court of nearly every State in this Union has passed on this question, and the consensus of judicial opinion is to the effect that there is no power under the Constitution, State or national, that authorizes a tax to be levied to build up private industries. I wish to call the attention of the House to another fact in connection with these decisions—that is, that a great many of these decisions were written by Republican judges who vote the Republican ticket and advocate a protective tariff on the stump. And yet when the question comes before them as to whether the State or nation can constitutionally levy a protective tariff or tax, under their oath of office and confronted with the crime of perjury they hold that it can not be done. Gentlemen, if an examination of the authorities I have cited does not convince you that a protective tariff is unconstitutional, then you are to be likened to the five brothers mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abraham said, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

There can be no legal doubt that under our Constitution a tax can not be levied on the people solely for the purpose of protection, and it should ever remain so. That power was not granted by the Constitution by the American people when the Government was formed nor has it been granted since. Such a law can be legally passed in England or Germany where they have no written constitution, but not in this country where our form of Government is one of limited powers. But for the sake of the argument grant the power to pass such a law; still it would be iniquitous and unjust, for it would be the right to tax one man for the benefit of another. If all the people are benefited alike then there is no benefit to any one.

If the sugar-raiser of Louisiana, Vermont, and Kansas should have a bounty from the public Treasury for the amount of sugar produced by them, then by parity of reason the corn-grower of Illinois, Iowa, and Indiana should have a bounty on corn. If the ocean carrying trade should be subsidized, then railroads and other inland modes of transportation should be subsidized. Why should one man in one trade be protected by a tariff tax for his encouragement and not another man in another occupation? Why should one man be compelled to pay a bounty to his neighbors when his neighbors pay no bounty to him? And if neighbors pay equal bounty to each other, where is the benefit?

It is therefore perfectly obvious that a tax to be protective must be unjust, for it must take from one class and give to another without receiving anything in return; that is what protection means and that is why it is called robbery. No man's rights can be based on another man's injury. If you take money from one man by law without his consent and give it to another you are certainly doing the first one an injury. Law can not make wrong right nor black white; you may pass a statute to that effect, but the ethical principle implanted in every honest human breast would revolt against it.

Protection contravenes the adage of the fathers of the Republic—that of "equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none." It promises large rewards to labor but it never fulfills the contract; it teaches that our farmers are the proper objects to be plundered if it can be done under the forms and sanction of law. It makes its levy upon the innocent and the unsuspecting without their knowledge and then divides it among the cunning and the unscrupulous. Every great fortune it creates results from the legal oppression of the poor. Protection draws its riches from the moans of the widow, the tears of the orphan, and the sweating-room of oppression. It is a financial monstrosity.

We build railroads, construct ships, open harbors, span rivers, tunnel mountains, appropriate millions for the improvement of harbors, construct ocean steamers, all for the benefit of free commerce in order to secure our part of the trade of the world, and then McKinleyism builds a Chinese wall around the country 62 feet high, and declares it would be a benefit to the American people if the Atlantic Ocean were "a sea of fire," forgetting that commerce is the golden girdle that binds the world together, and that we are not only citizens of the Republic, but of the world as well, and that even the love of country should not be greater than the love of mankind, and that all politics that war against the law of God are hurtful to the race. Restriction belongs to the past and is contrary to the spirit of freedom.

Freedom is our greatest glory. Our soil is free, our thought is free, our ballot is free, our speech is free, our press is free, our laboring men should be free; and I sincerely hope that when the measure under consideration is enacted into law it will secure larger liberty to the toiling millions of the world. That is what the election in 1892 meant, the liberty of trade, industrial and personal liberty. It was the mightiest revolution ever enacted in this country, and a solemn protest against the robbery of taxation. The whole system stood on two colossal falsehoods, the one that it would secure "better wages" to labor, and the other that it would secure the "home market" to the American farmer. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to examine these two propositions.

THE LABORING MAN AND THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

The Democratic platform that I have read to the House declares "that since the McKinley bill became a law there has been ten reductions in the wages of labor to where there has been one increase." I maintain the truth of this proposition, and I am prepared to prove and maintain that a protective tariff never raised the wages of labor in this or any other country in the world. It was not intended by its authors that it should have that effect, and in the very nature of things it could not accomplish that end. The manufacturers of this country received the benefit of the protective tariff. I will grant that it enabled them to pay better wages to their laborers if they saw proper, but the question is, Did they do so? I insist they did not. The Carnegies, Rockwells, Scotts, and other tariff barons are able to pay their laborers $20 per day and still have sufficient left to support themselves and their families in luxury and idleness if they should live to the age of Methuselah. Protected manufacturers never showed any disposition to share their "bonus" with their workmen except upon compulsion.

But what did these protected millionaire capitalists pay their laborers? Simply the ordinary market wages. I am willing to admit that wages are higher in America than they are in Europe, but this is not due to the protective tariff. Wages were higher in this country than in Europe before McKinleyism was in swaddling clothes. The high wages in this country, if they may be called such, are due to other causes than a restrictive tariff. The labor unions and Knights of Labor have done more to secure reasonable wages for laboring men than all the tariff laws passed by the Republican party. There are, also, many other reasons why wages should be higher in this country than across the waters in foreign lands. England has a population of 400 to the square mile, and the average wages paid were 97 cents per day.

New England has a population of 210 to the square mile, and the average wages paid here were 1.02 per day, 5 cents more than in England. The State of Ohio has a population of 80 to the square mile and their wages average about $1.80. But while the wages are nominally 5 cents per day higher in Massachusetts than they are in England, yet this is more apparent than real when you take into account the purchasing power of money in that State and England.

I insist that a protective tariff always reduces the wages of labor, because it increases the price of consumption. When a protective tax is placed on anything coming into this country from abroad, the price of that article to the consumer is increased to the amount of such tax.

If a man's clothing costs him more because of a restrictive tariff, then his wages will not purchase as much clothing. If the tariff were on labor, then the wages of labor would raise in accordance with the same rule that applies to goods; but the tariff is not on the labor (that is on the free list) but on the products of labor, which is entirely a different thing. If, however, the protective tariff should raise the price of wages at all, then it could only apply to those engaged in the protected industries, which only amount to less than 9 per cent of our laboring population. I wish to mention another fact that conclusively proves that a protective tariff does not increase the wages of the laborer, and that is that laborers in unprotective industries are as well paid off, if not better, than those in the protective industries. If a protective tariff raises the price of wages, then the wages in Germany and France should be higher than in free-trade England, which is not the fact.

There is a greater difference in wages of labor in the different States of the Union than there is between this country and Europe. Colorado pays wages three times as high as North Carolina, Dakota twice as high as Alabama, California nearly twice as high as Massachusetts, and Illinois higher than Virginia. At least this was the condition of things before the recent labor troubles in the West.

But when me make a final analysis of wages we find that it is not the dollars received, but the food and clothing that the money will buy. Profit is not the money handled, but the sum saved at the end of each year. But to prove conclusively, and beyond cavil, that the laboring man does not get the benefit of the protective tariff I will state the fact that the average labor cost of production in America in all the protected industries is but 18 per cent, or placed by the highest statistician at 21 per cent, and the average duty by the McKinley bill is over 50 per cent.

Now, who gets the tariff? The manufacturers, of course. If the laborers got it why should there now be 3,000,000 laborers out of employment willing to labor but no work to do? and in a country where there is more than sufficient for all, they are compelled to beg from place to place for their daily bread.

For the last twenty years the American people have been outrageously taxed "for the benefit of the laboring man." Why, then, manufacturers in robes and laborers in rags, millionaires and paupers? The poor are the laborers for whom these tariff laws were passed, for whose benefit the people have been taxed over a billion of dollars annually, yet organized cunning despoiled labor of it all.

When the McKinley bill was under consideration in this House Carnegie & Co. secured an increase of protection for their business (of course for the benefit of the laboring man, as is usual in such cases), but after the McKinley tariff went into effect Carnegie & Co. reduced the wages of their laborers; and in order to make the reduction more effectual they called in the Pinkerton thugs and knaves to shoot down the honest labor off of which they had grown rich. And finally the Republican recipe for all labor troubles, the militia, was called in, and organized labor at Homestead was again forced under the galling yoke of slavery. Then a committee of this House was sent to Homestead to investigate the question of wages by that highly protected institution which every man, woman, and child in the United States was taxed to support. And when the committee asked for information as to the manner in which these taxes were used the committee was informed that it was a private affair.

Not only did Carnegie & Co. reduce the price of wages in their factories, but since the passage of the McKinley tariff the wages of labor were reduced in several thousand other protected industries. My colleague and seat mate from New York [Mr. WARNER] in the last Congress furnished a list of the reduction of wages in the protected industries, which covers several pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There is no doubt about the fact that the Chicago platform is correct in its statement that "since the passage of the McKinley bill there have been ten reductions in the wages of labor to where there has been one increase." The following statement, which I take from the Philadelphia Press of December 26, the very citadel of protection, as uttered by the General Master Workman of the Knights of Labor, reads that—

Everywhere is starvation and death, while corporate greed and avaricious money lords apply the arrogant lash with relentless fury, and Congress, like a wooden god, looks down in silent contempt on the miseries of the most patriotic and industrious people the world ever knew. With these conditions confronting the people everywhere, if we can not permeate society with a healty public opinion on the subject of labor and force the adoption of our principles we deserve defeat. In the city of Philadelphia laboring men have been voting the Republican ticket solidly for the past twenty years. "They have sown the wind and they reap the whirlwind."

THE FARMER AND THE HOME MARKET.

The Republican national committee of 1892 issued a pamphlet to be used in the campaign, and on the first page of the book it is promised of the McKinley bill "To scatter plenty over a smiling land;" and further on the statement is made that "It will secure work for thousands of idle men and women. It will materially reduce the farmer's expenses and greatly increase his profits, but it will not raise the price to the American consumer of one single article that can be termed a necessary expense." The McKinley bill is in force to-day and is scattering plenty over a smiling land. I wonder how the farmers of the country enjoy that plenty this year. What a roaring farce, this promise of the Republican party! If any class deserves well of this country it is the farming class.

The supreme rule of the Democratic party with reference to taxation is that the taxation from the citizen must be limited to the needs of the Government economically administered, and that any taxation beyond this, from whatever pretext of public policy, is an infringement upon Democratic freedom. In America the great burden of taxation falls upon the farmer. He belongs to a class which is first in number and economic importance to the country. It may be true that the question of numbers may not be of any particular consequence in considering the question of equal justice, for he would be entitled to equal political right if there were but one-half the number. It need not rest exclusively on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number, but upon the theory that every man is entitled to equal and exact justice.

With the farmer there is no combination or monopoly; he is confronted with the necessity of selling to the world on a purely competitive basis. The farmers' burdens from year to year are gradually growing heavier. The trite saying was, "Young man go West and grow up with the country." But the plan now is to organize corporations in the East for the special purpose of placing mortgages all over the West upon farms at nearly double the rate of interest prevailing in the East, and in this way the profits of farming are largely abstracted by the corporations and their ally, the protective tariff. The farm mortgages of the country amount now to nearly $4,000,000,000, and, of course, no sane person ever expects that this vast sum will ever be paid. It can not be paid; there is not money enough in the country to pay this stupendous debt. The cunning money sharks of the country have seen to it that there shall not be sufficient money in the country to transact its business, for they have contracted the currency nearly 50 per cent for that very purpose. The prisoner is in jail and they have destroyed the prison keys. What will the end be?

The Democratic platform explains the situation—that is, "that the protective system fosters no industry so fully as it does that of the sheriff." These mortgages will be foreclosed and the present occupants of the land will be turned out, as has been done already in thousands of cases in Kansas and other Western States, and these lands will be owned by the corporations which have eaten up the borrower by their modern cannibalism usury.

What next? Why, the axiomatic truth that "who owns the soil owns the labor on the soil" will have full operation. This is only another statement of the Divine truth that "the borrower is the servant of the lender."

The necessity that makes one man toil for the benefit of another man makes the first man the slave of the second whether his skin is black or white. This whole nefarious scheme is the work of plutocracy, aided by its natural guardian, the Republican party, and the special subject of attack is the farmer. He is made their dupe and victim. I had the honor during the last Presidential campaign to hear the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who is still serving in the other end of the Capitol, make a speech in my own town to the farmers. In his remarks he ridiculed the statement that Democrats make; that is, "that the consumers pay the tariff." He illustrated his position by the statement that under the McKinley bill the tariff duty on calico was 6 cents, and the price here was but 5 cents. He wanted the farmers to tell him who paid that duty, and the horny handed sons of toil laughed themselves almost silly at the profound wisdom of their Senator.

The Senator did not tell them, nor did they see proper to ask him, what would be the effect if there were no duty on calico. Clearly, if there were no duty at all on calico the domestic manufacturer would be compelled to sell for 4 cents, and if this is true then calico is protected 25 per cent. He used the same statement about a certain class of nails upon which the duty under the McKinley bill is more than the market price here. In each case he forgot, I suppose, to state what the effect would be if there were no duty on calico and nails. But he did not forget to tell them how the farmers were protected by the McKinley bill by a tariff on wheat of 20 cents, and then we had three cheers for the McKinley bill.

I saw some of the same farmers this summer selling their wheat for 40 cents per bushel, and I reminded them of the Senator's statement, and that I thought that if they would make out their bill and send it to him for the 20 cents protection, the Senator would likely get it for them or give them a new chestnut.

Every intelligent person knew at the time that the pretended protection of the farmers by the McKinley bill on wheat was a fraud and a humbug. It could not be done in that way. Its real purpose was to still further deceive the farmers of the country into supporting the Republican party.

But, thank God, the scales have fallen from the eyes of the farmers and laborers, and they will not be deceived longer.

The requiem of the protective tariff system was sung in this country in 1892, and I know that it is dead, but I wish to punish the robber after death by giving it a few more kicks and cuffs. The Illinois farmer pays 50 per cent more for his manufactured goods than he would were there no tariff; therefore the Illinois farmer to the extent of that per cent is impoverished. Massachusetts sells her manufactured goods 50 per cent higher than she could sell them were there no tariff; therefore Massachusetts is enriched this per cent by reason of such protection. This being so, does not the Illinois farmer pay the tax of Massachusetts, and in addition thereto give her a bonus for the privilege? Labor creates all capital, and surely the laborer should at least have a just and full share of that which he creates.

If labor were allowed equal privilege with capital, then there would be no conflict between them. But when the Government steps in and by the exercise of power enters into partnership with capital and takes from labor the fruits of its production and gives it to capital, then labor becomes the slave of the master it has created, and in this way every farmer in the land is made the slave of capital.

Wealth has accumulated in this country in the last twenty years at a rate never before known, but it has been at a fearful cost to the farmer. The accumulation has not been of a uniform rate: hundreds have grown rich while millions have grown poor, all through the intervention of the Government that should protect all alike.

In order to show how unfairly the protective tariff treats the farmer, I will use some figures which I submitted to the House when the McKinley bill was under consideration, but they will bear repeating.

These figures are taken from the census of 1880 and they show the increase of wealth of the farmer under the Walker tariff, and the decrease under the protective tariff:

	Farm values.
1850	$3,271,575,422
1860	6,545,045,007
1870	9,262,803,861
1880	10,197,096,776
Increase
1850 to 1860	$3,273,469,575 or 100 per cent.
1860 to 1870	2,717,758,854 or 41 per cent.
1870 to 1880	934,292,915 or 9 per cent.

It will be seen that there was an increase of 100 per cent from 1850 to 1860, and but 9 per cent from 1870 to 1880, when we had a high tariff.

Now I will take from the census of 1880 (Compendium, page 926) the following figures, which show the advantage manufacturers have over farmers:

Farms, 1880.
Amount invested	$12,104,080,000
Value of products	22,790,272,000
Persons employed	7,670,400
Product per hand	$288
Manufacturers, 1880.
Amount invested	$2,790,270,000
Total product	5,369,579,000
Cost of material	3,369,825,000
Value of product less material	$1,972,756,000
Persons employed	2,732,000
Product per hand	$721

What a splendid margin in favor of the manufacturers. Now, another lesson. How have farms increased as compared with other values? In 1860 the farmers owned nearly one-half the wealth of the nation, as appears from the census:

Farm values, 1860	$7,988,443,000
Other values	8,179,123,000
Farm values, 1880	12,140,081,000
Other values	31,537,902,000
Increase of farm values	4,123,688,000
Increase of other values	23,358,797,000
Increase of farm values in twenty years of protection	51 per cent.
Increase in other values for the same time	280 per cent.

Oh, for a name to call this infernal thing; robbery is too mild. I would call it Devil or Hell if I were not afraid it might offend his Satanic majesty.

As to the fallacy of the home market, I take some figures from the Statistician of 1893 as to our wheat product:

	Bushels.
Total wheat crop, 1891	611,780,000
Consumption for food	302,000,000
Seed	54,508,000
Surplus	255,172,000

Now, in order to consume the surplus so that the farmer would have a home market, it would require us to import into this country more than 50,000,000 persons to devour this wheat at 5 bushels per capita, or more immigrants than ever came to this country. What a blessing this would be for our laboring men. But this is not all; our surplus wheat is less than one-third the surplus of our farms that we ship and sell in foreign markets annually. So, therefore, in order to find a home market for all our farm surplus, we would be compelled to import three times 50,000,000 immigrants to consume it all.

What a ridiculous farce this would be. And yet Senator Cullom and men of his cloth talk to the farmers about their home market, and they swallow it as a Utopian dream and vote for a protective tariff, which will in the end, as certain as day follows night, result in driving the farmer from his homestead and his children to the poorhouse. The abandoned farms of New England tell more eloquently than words that the farmers have not shared in the increased profit from protection, neither has that home market of which they have heard so much materialized.

To sum the matter up, the census of 1880 shows that the manufacturers made on their business a net profit of 36½ per cent per annum, and on investigations of the census of 1890 it is found that the McKinley bill adds about 7½ per cent, making it now 44½ per cent, while the farms have not made over 2 per cent. This is the effect of protection, and if this is justice I have no conception of the meaning of that word. Mr. Chairman, I speak for the farmer, and I represent on this floor an agricultural district the equal of any in this Union of States, and a constituency as patriotic and generous-hearted as the world ever saw, and in their names and by their authority I solemnly protest against this iniquitous system that has clothed the toiler in rags and the rascal in robes, that applauds cunning and sneers at integrity, that has driven the American flag from the seas and given our carrying trade to England. It has filled the cottage of the laborer with sorrow and sent his children supperless to bed: it threatens the safety of our free institutions.

Mr. Chairman, the man who does not comprehend the iniquity and injustice of the protective system is a fool; the man who does and fails to denounce it is a coward; the man who comprehends it and favors it for party or personal ends is a knave, and the man who understands its workings and has the courage to denounce it is worthy of being called an American freeman.

Gentlemen, do not deceive yourselves; the battle for tariff reform is on and "he who halts is a coward, and he who doubts is damned."

Every consideration of justice, safety, and patriotism demands prompt and decisive action in the passage of the bill under consideration. It will reduce the average rate of duty 18.40 per cent, and the taxes, as estimated, nearly $75,000,000, and leave that sum in the pockets of the people; and more than $300,000,000 will be saved to the farmers and laborers in the reduction of the prices of things they must necessarily purchase and consume.

When this bill becomes a law it may reduce the income of Carnegie so that he will not be able to build another wing to his castle in the mountains of Scotland this year, and he may have to reduce the number of horses that he drives to his tallyho, but it will bring comfort to thousands of American homes, the citadel of American liberty. It will bring a glow of health to the cheek of the farmer's wife and bread to the children of labor.

The true grandeur and safety of this nation consist not in its great cities, gorgeous capitols, great corporations where opulent princes trade in money coined from the sweat of labor; but in strong, noble, honest men, pure, free, and happy women, sweet healthy children—in a word, in the well ordered homes of our laboring peasantry.

Mr. Chairman, in these homes the indomitable and unconquerable spirit of freedom had its birth, which gave life to the American nation, and when the nation was in danger from these homes came its defenders. The farmers are the founders of civilization and the protectors of liberty, and yet for the last quarter of a century in this country our farmers have been manacled and chained in worse than Egyptian bondage. But thanks to their own good sense and intelligence, they have finally succeeded in unbarring their prison door, and on the passage of this bill they will be restored to their original industrial freedom, to which they are entitled by nature and nature's God. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I think the most absurd statement that I have ever heard made on this floor since I have been a member of this House was one made a few minutes ago by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] who has just taken his seat. If I understood him correctly he said that when a man went to a store and bought a dollar's worth of goods fifty cents of that dollar was taxes. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that that is the most absurd statement I have ever heard made upon this floor since I have been a member of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I listened attentively this afternoon to the speech of the learned gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and heard him ring the changes for an hour on the charge that the tariff was a tax.

And I heard him charge that the poor man of this country was, in consequence, paying an awful, fearful, oppressive tax upon his clothing, and the distinguished gentleman exhibited on this floor samples of European woolen used by the middle classes of men and women in the United States.

He told of the terrible per cent the American people had to pay to get these goods with which to clothe themselves and their children, and he almost put the Democratic side of the House in tears over the wrongs of the poor working people who, I think he said, had to work one day in three to pay their taxes in the form of duty.

I believe it was Nasby who in describing the funeral of a dear friend which he attended, and with whom he had enjoyed drinking whisky and cocktails on numerous occasions, said that he was unable to weep at his friend's funeral because when he thought of these occasions all the juices of his body went to his mouth and he could not weep. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

So I was unable to weep at the argument of the gentleman from West Virginia, because I know and everybody knows and he ought to know that the middle classes in this country do not buy the woolens or the clothing they wear in England, nor pay the awful duty he spoke of for the very good reason that they clothe themselves in better goods of American manufacture, and I affirm that the clothing worn by the great mass of the people in this country is manufactured in America, and that clothing in the United States is sold cheaper than in any other country on the face of the earth, and our countrymen are indifferent to the duty on European fabrics except as they protect American manufacturers and give employment to American labor. [Applause.]

The argument of the gentleman from West Virginia that the tariff is a tax has been so often exploded and refuted on this floor and elsewhere that it seems a waste of words to repeat the arguments.

Has the gentleman from West Virginia forgotten the delegation of merchants who appeared before his committee from Bermuda, and denounced the McKinley act and asked for its repeal, because they said they had to pay the duty in order to sell their goods in the American market? Two familiar illustrations of the fallacy of the tariff-tax argument suffice. I think that the duty on a barrel of salt is about $2. Hundreds of thousands of barrels are sold by the salt manufacturers of this country at 50 cents a barrel and the barrel thrown in.

Will not the gentleman from West Virginia tell me where the tax comes in? [Applause.]

The watch business affords another illustration of the effect of the duty to cheapen articles to the American consumer. The effect of placing a duty on watches, which were formerly bought principally in Europe, was to start twenty watch factories in this country, and to-day, owing to American skill, invention, and genius, the best watch made on the face of the earth is an American watch, and can be bought for one-half what it could when the duty was imposed.

THE EFFECTS OF FREE WOOL

The gentleman from West Virginia was quite correct in saying that sheep-raising for wool—and he might have added for any other purpose—had largely disappeared east of the Mississippi; and that disappearance has moved with gigantic strides since it was known that this Congress would insert a free-wool provision in this bill. The truth is that the farmers of this country, without a protective duty, can not compete at the price of labor in this country with the foreign producers of this article.

The truth is that the farmers are all killing their sheep and going out of the business, which explains the present unheard of low price of mutton, and I am told that not in seventy years has wool been so low in this country as now, and that Canadian manufacturers of woolens are paying duty and importing wool from the United States into Canada.

I think the learned professor from West Virginia has something yet to learn in regard to the woolen business and the cloth and clothing trade and the cost of the cloth and clothing largely and principally worn by the people of this country, and learned and scholarly as he is, he is not the only college professor who has something to learn. I think it was Senator Hoar who said that President Elliot could not pass examination as a freshman in the matter of the construction, cost, and tariff on parts of a wagon with which he illustrated a tariff speech. And I think it was Senator Hawley of Connecticut who said "the learned president of Harvard was ignorant of anything that was out doors."

The gentleman from West Virginia denounced the duty on coal and iron as an unjust subsidy to the bloated bondholders and the railroads of the country. And he would take this business away from the American railroads and American coastwise vessels.

Has the gentleman seen a map of the railroads of the United States that have gone into insolvency since this bill or its contents have been known.

I do not charge that threatened free coal is entirely responsible for this unprecedented failure of railroads, but it is undoubtedly due to the business prostration incident to Democratic success, and the threatened revolution in the economic and financial policy under which the country has enjoyed a wonderful prosperity for thirty years. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent upon this floor two hundred thousand people, largely engaged in the manufacturing business, and I think that I can truthfully say that for many years prior to one year ago last November, when it was known that Grover Cleveland was elected and the Democratic party was in control of all the Departments of the Government—I say prior to that time, and under the Republican policy of protection inaugurated by the Morrill tariff bill in 1860, my constituents in the old Second and new Twelfth (substantially the same) were as happy, contented, and prosperous as any people in any State or country on the face of the earth.

The manufacturing cities and villages were filled with happy and contented workingmen, many of them owning their own homes. Many of the towns and cities were adding waterworks, electric light plants were being married together by a network of electric railroads, the benefit of which the rich and the poor, the high and the low, all shared alike.

Educational institutions were thriving and prosperous. I think every town and city in the district has a public library, and many of them were erecting library buildings and establishing reading rooms for the benefit of all classes.

Institutions of religion were well supported; the spire of the house of God pointed toward Heaven in every village and hamlet in my district.

The farmers in the agricultural sections of my district found a ready and quick sale for their product in the manufacturing towns and cities. And under the wise and far-reaching statesmanship of the McKinley tariff bill the farmer, the manufacturer, the workingmen and employés, indeed all classes of citizens, and every occupation and business were enjoying a wonderful development and prosperity.

And I presume in this regard the history of the district I represent was the history of Massachusetts and other great Commonwealths of the Union.

At the election in November, 1892, the people for the first time in thirty years turned over the control of the House, Senate, and all the Departments of the Government to the Democratic party, elected upon the principles of the Chicago platform, which declared that all protection to American industries was unconstitutional, and which declared in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and which declared in favor of the repeal of the "10 per cent tax" and in favor of the revival of the old State bank.

The effect of this political revolution began to be immediately felt. The country was on the high tide of prosperity, and the result was not seriously felt at first; but in the face of the Democratic platform, manufacturers began to reduce their output; merchants began to buy sparingly, anticipating the lower prices promised by the Democratic speakers and papers, which resulted in the employment of less help and the discharge of many employés; one business reacted upon another, the consuming power of our people was gradually but surely reduced, and has been growing from bad to worse until the present time, until the conditions of 1857, when we were under a tariff for revenue the last time, are being repeated. In 1857, in the face of an abundant harvest, one inhabitant in thirteen and one-half in New York State was a pauper, and soup houses were opened in every ward in New York City to feed the starving poor.

So now in the face of the Wilson tariff bill, which threatens destruction to many of our great manufacturing interests, in the face of the abundant harvest of last year, relief committees are being organized in all the great centers of the country to feed the worthy and deserving poor.

And distress and gaunt hunger and want stares many an honest workingman and his family in the face. Instead of prosperity we have adversity, instead of happy and contented workingmen we have idle factories, or running on reduced time at reduced wages.

Instead of confidence we have distrust, and in consequence of the change in the economic and financial policy of the country from the Republican to the Democratic party it is believed that every species of property in this country has shrunk from 25 to 40 per cent, describing a grand total of $15,000,000,000, and the end is not yet.

The Democratic speakers and newspapers attempted to charge this terrible changed condition, which condition nobody could deny, to the Sherman act, and to the purchase of silver under that act.

After an agony of three months, the Democratic Senate repealed the purchasing clause of that act. The Democratic speakers and papers predicted that business would immediately brighten, and that prosperity would again return to our distressed country. And if their premises, as to the cause, were correct, that Republican silver legislation was the cause of the distress, their prophecy would prove to be true. Neither was true.

The purchasing clause of the Sherman act should have been repealed, as it was, but it was preposterous, false, and absurd to charge the present situation to that act. The Government could sink $3,000,000 a month in the ocean without producing any such result. The threatened revision of the tariff on free-trade lines, and as contemplated by the Wilson bill, now before us, was the immediate, direct, and almost the only cause of the appalling misfortune which has overtaken the country.

The Democrats are wont to describe their party and policy as the party of Jefferson, Jackson, and the Constitution. They must mean Jefferson Davis, Stonewall Jackson, and the Confederate constitution. Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson were protectionists. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The Wilson bill is drawn on the line of the Confederate constitution, which stood for absolute, unrestricted free trade, and the Southern and Confederate end is at present the dominant and controlling end of the Democratic party of the country, and they demand the privilege of exchanging their cotton, lumber, tobacco, rice, hemp, raised with cheap negro labor, for European goods also manufactured with cheap, poorly paid labor; and that is the policy that dominates and controls the country now. That is the policy which dictates our economic policy to the great manufacturing and empire States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts [applause], and also dictates that the agricultural products of Canada and the lumber of that vast region shall have the duty so reduced as to come in competition with the products of the great States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota.

The following quotation from the platform of Andrew Jackson shows conclusively that the present Democratic party is not the party of Jackson:

PLATFORM OF ANDREW JACKSON 1832.

Resolved, That an adequate protection of industry is indispensable to the prosperity of the country, and that an abandonment of the policy at this period would be attended with consequences serious to the best interests of this nation.

PLATFORM OF BENJAMIN HARRISON, 1892.

We reaffirm the American doctrine of protection. We call attention to its growth abroad. We maintain that the prosperous condition of our country is largely due to the wise revenue legislation of the Republican Congress. We believe that all articles which can not be produced in the United States, except luxuries, should be admitted free of duty, and that on all imports coming into competition with the products of American labor there should be levied duties equal to the difference between wages abroad and at home.

PLATFORM OF GROVER CLEVELAND, 1892.

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud upon the labor of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of a few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue only.

The Democrats of 1832 and the Republicans of 1892 seem to agree.

Since the development of the Democratic policy an election was held last November, and the country condemned the Democracy in thunder tones that drowned the roar of Niagara in the States where elections were held—in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa. The Democratic party was buried out of sight, and the people of those great States commanded the Democratic party to halt; and surely, in the face of this verdict, there should be no economic legislation until the country can be heard from again in the Congressional elections of next fall. If the Wilson bill should be deferred until such election it could never pass this body.

The people have already pronounced against it; patriotism and honesty demand that its consideration shall be deferred until the voice of the people can again be heard.

And this is not all; incompetency marks the Democratic administration in every department, if not something worse. Witness our humiliation in the eyes of the civilized world over the foreign policy of President Cleveland and Secretary Gresham in the affairs of the Sandwich Islands—in painful contrast to the diplomacy and wise statesmanship of Benjamin Harrison and James G. Blaine.

Incompetency marks the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury; he undoubtedly precipitated the panic and augmented the distress of the country, and brought back our securities from abroad by an authorized interview last summer, in which he said it might be necessary to pay the Government's obligations in silver, and by his more recent utterances in favor of destroying the collateral behind the Treasury notes, issued for silver bullion, by threats to coin the seigniorage.

Now, while towns and cities are attempting to devise ways and means and to give public work to the unemployed, what a grand chance there is for the Government to do something in the same line by pushing public buildings and public works, already authorized by Congress, which would give work to thousands of the unemployed.

Instead of that wise policy on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as I can learn, public buildings and public works are at a dead stand. Let me give an illustration or two: The Fifty-first Congress voted to erect a public post-office building at an expense of $75,000 at the city of Taunton, in my district, upon the condition that the city would donate the site; the grand old patriotic city of Taunton responded promptly and donated a beautiful park in the center of the city to the Government of the United States, and got the act legalized by the Legislature of Massachusetts; this lot when donated would have sold for $50,000 under the hammer; the title and all the preliminaries, survey, etc., were fully complete when the present Administration came into power nearly a year ago. In vain I have repeatedly urged upon the Secretary of the Treasury and upon the Supervising Architect the patriotic conduct of the city in donating the site, the unemployed workmen in the city, to whom the work would be a godsend, the fact that by the generous conduct of the city the Government would obtain a property worth $125,000 for $75,000. All my pleadings go for nothing. The grass in this beautiful park, now owned by the Government, was knee deep last summer, disfiguring the city, and not a blow was struck on this building, voted by Congress three years ago, and for which the money has been set aside.

Once more. The Government voted to build a post-office building in the city of Washington at the same time. There are thousands of unemployed mechanics in this city to whom this work would be a godsend, and would relieve the charitable people of Washington of a burden that they can ill afford to bear. A million dollars or more is to be expended for this building and practically nothing is being done upon it; a half dozen iron pillars have been stood up to show that the Secretary of the Treasury has not forgotten it, and on yesterday I saw two or three lonesome workmen pounding a bolt in one of these iron beams. These are but illustrations of the Government work which is so much needed all over the country.

A want of patriotism marks the conduct of the Secretary of the Interior, and these Halls have recently echoed with denunciations of that officer of the Government, and his unpatriotic and unjust conduct of the Pension Bureau, and, thank God, this denunciation was not confined to Republicans. There were found Democrats on this floor brave enough and manly enough to join with the Republicans, like the gentleman from Indiana Mr. MARTIN, and that scarred, maimed, and war-worn veteran of the Union Army, Gen. SICKLES, of New York. [Applause.]

Well may the country cry out, "How long: oh! how long?"

Now, I come to some specific items in the Wilson tariff bill now before us. This bill is certainly neither fish, flesh, nor fowl. It certainly is not drawn on the line of the Chicago platform.

While it ruthlessly slaughters many of the great industries of the country, and will either close these establishments or reduce the workmen to European level, it seems in other spots to be drawn on protection lines, especially when the interest to be protected is a Democratic one. On page 32 I find a high specific duty on the products of Florida, oranges and lemons, while apples raised in the Northern States are on the free list.

On page 30 I find a high specific duty on rice, a product of South Carolina and Louisiana and other Southern States.

Then it has its likes and dislikes in the Northern States, and there seems to be a method in this madness: To illustrate other features of the bill:

Gen. Alger, of Michigan, is perhaps the most extensive dealer in lumber in the United States; he is also a large contributor to the Republican campaign fund; his business is ruthlessly slaughtered by so low a duty or no duty as to bring him in direct competition with Canadian lumber just across the line.

On the other hand, the most extensive chocolate manufacturer in this country lives in Massachusetts. He is a very nice gentleman. He is a personal friend of mine. He makes the best chocolate, bromo, cocoa, and cocoa butter in the world. I use it in my family in preference to any foreign product. By his enterprise and skill, and thanks to the Republican policy of protection, he has built up an enormous business in these products. And I am told that his output reaches the enormous figure of 30 tons per day when the country is in its normal condition, and gives employment to many American workmen. He is a generous employer of labor, and an open-handed, generous, public-spirited citizen.

But I am sorry to have to say that this gentleman has gone astray upon the tariff, at least for other products than his own. He is a tariff reformer, and presides at their meetings; yes, more than that, he is a free trader and a stanch Democrat, and more than that he is the largest contributor in Massachusetts to the Democratic campaign fund; with that generosity which characterizes him in other directions he contributes thousands to the State and national Democratic campaign.

Now turn to page 34 of this bill, and there you read the strange device, "Chocolate, 2 cents per pound duty;" "Cocoa, 2 cents per pound duty;" "Cocoa butter, 3½ cents per pound duty."

The majority of the committee in their report argue at length in favor of ad valorum and not specific duty; but there is no ad valorem foolishness about the duty on chocolate and cocoa, but here is a specific duty of 2 cents per pound. Now I suggest to the committee that they offer an amendment here and make it 4 cents per pound, and thus enable my friend to double his subscription to the Democratic campaign fund, for they will need it at the next election. [Applause.]

Surely here is a sight for gods and men. In a bill drawn on free-trade lines these two illustrations which I have given are but illustrations of other simlar inconsistencies and acts of favoritism: a lumber-dealer, a large Republican contributor, marked for slaughter; a chocolate manufacturer, a large Democratic contributor, has every principle of the bill slaughtered and has his business protected by a high specific duty.

There is a large factory in my district at old Plymouth, Mass., that manufactures binding-twine; the treasurer, Mr. Holmes, is a red-hot Republican; binding-twine is put on the free list. They make binding-twine in Hongkong, China; they have the most improved American machinery; they pay the workmen 15 cents per day. There are 12,000 men employed in the cordage industry in New England; it is needless to describe the effect of this bill upon these manufacturers and workmen.

There are extensive granite quarries in Eastern Massachusetts, particularly in Quincy, which was formerly in my district. Turn to page 15, you will find the duty has been reduced to one-half on finished granite; this would enable the manufacturer at Quincy or Randolph to send granite blocks as ballast to Europe and have them returned finished for buildings, capitals, and monuments, and make a large saving at the present price of wages, with the duty in this bill. One of two things must happen if this bill passes, every granite quarry in this country must reduce wages or close.

These are but illustrations of the slaughter of other industries in my district by the proposed Wilson tariff bill.

Now, how is it proposed to make good the large loss in revenue which this bill contemplates? Why, by an income tax, which is a tax upon thrift and prosperity, and however fine it may be in theory, it is well described by the gentleman from New York, Mr. COCKRAN, when he says it should be styled a "bill to fine honest men and pay a premium on perjury."

Under the McKinley tariff bill the foreigners who sent goods to this country paid the tax, as was testified to by the merchants of Bermuda who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Under this bill it is proposed to abandon that policy of having the foreigners who import goods into our country support the Government and pay the taxes. I say it is proposed to substitute for this policy a revival of the odious war tax to be paid by our own people, one of the most obnoxious and offensive of which is the income tax, which is paid by truthful, honest men, and entirely escaped by those that are dishonest. Of all the odious, unjust systems of taxation that were ever devised the income tax is the most odious and most offensive and most unjust. [Applause.]

On my return to Washington after the holiday recess, I sat in a seat with the agent of a great manufacturing corporation that employs thousands of workmen in the city of Fall River. He said to me, "If the Wilson bill becomes a law, our concern will have no alternative except to close our factory or reduce the wages of our employés 40 per cent, approximating the European level."

The talk about the benefit to manufacturers resulting from free raw material, free coal, free iron ore, and free wool called for by this bill will deceive no intelligent person.

The benefit to the manufacturers of my section resulting from the removal of 75 cents per ton on bituminous coal will in no way compensate for the reduced duty on the finished product of these establishments.

When you take into the account that a ton of iron when manufactured into tacks, rivets, printing presses, stoves, etc., is worth from $150 to $500 per ton, a duty of 75 cents per ton on coal and a small duty upon iron ore is not an important factor of the cost, and, I repeat, is unimportant as compared with the protection of these finished products from the competition of European manufacturers and poorly paid workmen.

Mr. Chairman, it does not take a statesman to see that if we reduce the duty on American agricultural or mechanical products so that we are to buy any considerable quantity of our goods in a foreign market, we can not at the same time manufacture these goods in our own country and give employment to American capital and American labor.

This bill strikes a blow at the great tack industry of my district and of Massachusetts by an ad valorem duty upon tacks that is too low for protection, and which will expose American manufacturers to injustice of undervaluation by foreign importers.

This bill provides for the importation of coal free of duty into the United States, and thus strikes a blow at American shipping and coastwise industry, which is now principally maintained by the coal interest.

And I have placed in my hand a memorial and resolutions passed against this bill by the Vessel Owners and Captains' National Association.

There is little doubt in my mind but that this bill, substantially as reported by the committee, will pass this Democratic House and Senate and be signed by Grover Cleveland and become a law, but I believe it is the duty of every Republican member of Congress to resist its passage by every means in his power.

There may be a slight improvement in business when the worst is known, when the uncertainty is removed and the policy of the Government is determined, until another Presidential election can be had; but there can be no permanent prosperity of the country while the present Democratic nightmare of free trade sits upon the vitals of the nation.

The Wilson law, at the longest, will be short lived; the baby's epitaph will fit this bill: "If I was so soon done for, what was I begun for?"

The country will have had an object lesson in Democratic control that will last the country another thirty years, and the friends of protection, the friends of the American agriculturist, the friends of the American manufacturer and American workman will surely elect the next national House of Representatives and the next President, and restore the country to the safe and Republican economic and financial policy under which we enjoyed for thirty years a marvelous growth and prosperity, unprecedented in the history of States and nations.

The following letter is a specimen of hundreds and untold thousands of letters that are being poured in upon members of Congress:

HAVERHILL, MASS., January 6, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Please do all you can to defeat the amendment or passage of the Wilson bill. It seems specially designed to annihilate values on all kinds of property, to destroy American industries, and to make American conditions for wage-earners impossible. The threat of its passage is shutting up our mills and workshops, shortening our hours of labor, cutting down our wages, and curtailing the farmers' market.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. RUSSELL.

Would refer you to Gen. COGSWELL.

The following is a specimen of resolutions of boards of trade and commercial organizations all over the country being poured in upon members of Congress denouncing and protesting against the passage of the Wilson bill, and undoubtedly speaks the sentiment of these great organizations representing the business and commerce of the country:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE, DREXEL BUILDING,
Philadelphia, January 5, 1894.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

At a quarterly meeting of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, held December 18, 1893, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the threatened radical modification by Congress of the existing tariff has caused and is causing widespread alarm and dismay among the industrial masses of the country, and general anxiety and distrust by the admission of wool, coal, iron ore, and other so-called raw materials to the free list, and by the sweeping reduction in rates of duty, and by the large substitution of ad valorem for specific duties; and

"Whereas the projected tariff bill now being prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, known as the Wilson bill, so far as the provisions of this bill have been given to the public, is intensifying alarm not only by its provisions, but by the uncertainty of the period when this bill, if enacted, shall take effect, is adding thousands to the already great army of the unemployed, creating deprivation and distress, which can not be easily relieved in the present depressed business condition of the country; and

"Whereas under the tariff system of the United States, which has existed since 1860, the unexampled prosperity of the nation can not be denied, and the threatened overthrow of such prosperity must not only be deplored, but condemned as rash and unjust; and

"Whereas the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, by continued and numerous amendments in the formation of the bill now about to be presented to Congress, show it is unsatisfactory even to its authors; and

"Whereas the apprehended passage of this unsatisfactory bill is throwing many thousands of the people out of employment, and compelling those still employed to suffer great reduction in the wage received for their labor: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Philadelphia Board of Trade is unalterably opposed to the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill.

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Philadelphia Board of Trade the intended radical modification of the existing tariff is injudicious and unwise and must be condemned as tending to the destruction of industrial employment of vast bodies of the people, and so causing needless distress and hardship.

Resolved, That the executive officers of this board are requested to send the foregoing preamble and resolutions to Congress, and to urge our Senators and Representatives to oppose the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill as a measure destructive to the welfare of this nation.

[True copy.]

FREDERICK FRALEY,
President Philadelphia Board of Trade

Attest:
W. R. TUCKER.

Harmony, consistency, or unity is not expected in the Democratic party. The student of political history has only to turn back to the Congressional debates at the time the Republicans found it necessary to impose an income tax as a war measure to get money to carry on the war and save us a nation among the nations of the earth.

He will find that the Democratic party in Congress at that time denounced the income tax as inquisitorial, unconstitutional, and an outrage upon the private right of citizens.

It was then necessary as a war measure. There can be no justification of it in a time of profound peace. While one wing of the Democratic party is demanding this tax there is another wing that still adhere to their former position in regard to it.

The following quotations from leading papers of New York are fair illustrations, and undoubtedly voice the sentiment of the people in all the great centers of business and trade:

A HIGH-HANDED OUTRAGE.

[New York Herald.]

The majority of the Ways and Means Committee has committed the reckless blunder of deciding in favor of a sweeping general income tax.

Against such a monarchical, inquisitorial imposition American manhood would rebel and condemn to ignominy the political party responsible for it.

There is no earthly excuse for the tax, since it is as unnecessary for needed revenue as it is obnoxious. To inflict it upon the people without necessity or excuse would be nothing short of a high-handed outrage.

A FATAL MISTAKE.

[New York Times.]

After protesting for twenty years against the continued imposition of war taxes in time of peace, the Democratic party can not reimpose the most odious of the war taxes and escape general condemnation. To make a personal income tax a feature of the Wilson tariff bill is to commit one of those fatal mistakes of policy that drive a party from power or destroy it, just as some great indiscretion destroys a private reputation, or a wrong step brings down a financial house.

To begin with, the income tax was decided upon in the Ways and Means Committee against the judgment and votes of those members of the majority who represent the principles of the Democratic party that are vital, sound, and continuing; while the proposition obtained its support from those members who, while no doubt perfectly sincere, are all of them in greater or less degree, and some of them altogether, imbued with those errors of economic and financial doctrine that have robbed the Democratic party of the confidence and support of thousands of men who, on other grounds, would gladly act with it.

INDIVIDUAL OPINIONS ADVERSE TO THIS METHOD OF RAISING REVENUE.

Thomas G. Shearman: The last years of the American income tax were a carnival of fraud, perjury, and blackmail.

Marshall Field: Such a tax is an iniquity itself, and has no place on the statute books of such a country as this.

Edward Atkinson: The adoption of an income tax will necessarily destroy that party responsible for it, no matter what its merits in other respects may be.

John Claflin: An income tax in time of peace is a perfect outrage. I have talked with many of the big wholesalers in the dry goods district, and neither there nor elsewhere have I found a single man in favor of it.

David A. Wells: It seems hardly open to dispute that a general income tax, with such inquisitorial features as are essential to make it effective as a revenue measure, can not be successfully administered under a free and popular form of government.

William E. Gladstone: I believe it does more than any other tax to demoralize and corrupt the people. So long as you consent, without special purpose, to levy the income tax as a part of the ordinary and permanent revenue of the country, so long it will be vain to talk of economy and effective reduction of expenditure.

A PREMIUM ON PERJURY.

[New York Press.]

An income tax is class legislation of the worst sort. It assails the fundamental doctrines of Americanism. It puts a premium on perjury. It necessitates the employment of a vast army of spies and informers, commissioned to pry into every man's business and intrude in matters with which the Government has no right, under ordinary conditions, to interfere.

ITS POLITICAL EFFECT.

[Brooklyn Eagle.]

If the Democratic party tries to pass, or by a majority of its Representatives and Senators at Washington favors, an income tax bill, it will probably lose control of the next Congress and will certainly deserve to do so.

AD VALOREM VS. SPECIFIC DUTIES.

An examination of the tariff bill now before the House shows that three hundred and fifty-four items of this bill are put under ad valorem duties. The claim made by the majority of the committee that it is impossible to make equitable specific duties, is not borne out by the facts or experience, either in this country or in other countries.

As has been so forcibly pointed out by others, the injustice to our merchants and manufacturers from ad valorem duties grows out of the fact that they open the door for fraud in undervaluation, and are thus another link in the free-trade evils to which this bill proposes to commit the country.

The following table confirms my statement above:

TARIFFS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The following shows the number of articles on which duties are imposed by ten foreign countries:

England imposes duties on 38 articles.
France imposes duties on 619 articles.
Austria imposes duties on 397 articles.
Russia imposes duties on 440 articles.
Sweden imposes duties on more than 300 articles.
Denmark imposes duties on 63 articles.
All the above duties are specific.
Germany's tariff makes 434 articles dutiable, and imposes specific duties on all but two.
Italy's tariff covers 837 articles, and on all but one the duties are specific.
Norway collects customs on more than 500 articles, and the duties are specific, except in six instances.
Spain with 369 articles on its tariff imposes an ad valorem duty on but one.
The above shows that out of more than 3,937 duties only 10 are on an ad valorem basis.

Thus it will be seen that this bill proposes to do indirectly, through the medium of undervaluation, what a majority of the committee have not the courage to do openly.

This bill by its extensive changes from specific duty—that is, by a duty by the piece, by the dozen, by the pound, by the cubic foot—to ad valorem duty, that is a percentage of the value fixed upon the goods by the exporter or importer, admitting of fraud in undervaluation. While it appears to afford protection and has the appearance of continuing something like the duty of the McKinley bill, as a matter of fact it throws down protection and exposes our manufacturers to cruel and unjust foreign competition.

Such a thing as consistency in the Democratic party is not looked for or expected. For thirty years they have repeatedly occupied the camp of the Republican party of previous Administrations.

The following quotation from Secretary Manning's report of 1886 shows the attitude of the Democratic party at that time as hostile to ad valorem duties:

Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices, or by undervaluations, or by any other means, under an ad valorem system, will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestably, they are even notoriously, inherent in that system.

And again, in 1888, Secretary Fairchild urged and demanded that when changes were made in duties they should be in the direction of substituting specific for ad valorem duties. This is what Secretary Fairchild said in 1888:

The high ad valorem tariff of the last quarter of a century has been the fruitful cause of devices to gain improper advantage at the custom-house. It is, therefore, desirable that in revising and reducing rates of duty they should be made specific instead of ad valorem, so far as the nature of the merchandise will admit.

That this bill is drawn in the interest of foreign and English manufacturers you have only to examine the files of English papers to discover. The Manchester (England) Courier says that the Wilson bill is "much more thorough than the most sanguine people on this side ventured to anticipate." It certainly is a good bill for people on that side.

I will insert in my remarks as germane to this discussion a letter from the author of the McKinley bill, giving his reason for protective policy and the protective bill which it is now proposed to repeal:

WHY M'KINLEY IS A PROTECTIONIST—COMPARISON WITH A REVENUE TARIFF.

I am a protectionist because I believe the protective system is best adapted to our conditions and citizenship. It does everything which a revenue tariff can do and vastly more. It supplies needed revenue—a revenue tariff can do no more. It accomplishes this end with equal if not greater certainty than a revenue tariff, and while doing this it widely discriminates in favor of American interests and is ever mindful of the welfare of the American people. It protects our own products against those of the alien and the stranger, while the domestic consumer is secured reasonable prices through domestic competition. It diversifies the employments and multiplies the opportunities of our people, secures an unrivaled home market for agriculture and unrivaled wages for labor. It encourages skill and genius to their highest activity and under its operation we have reached the foremost rank in invention and mechanism and the widest individual and national prosperity. It favors the United States and is the true friend of every American girl and boy struggling upward. It builds up; it never pulls down.

W. MCKINLEY, JR.

To sum up, the purpose of the pending bill is to relieve foreigners from paying the duties upon goods which they import into this country in competition with American goods, and to impose new and odious taxes upon our own people to make up the deficiency. And pray what benefit will free wool, free coal, and free iron ore be to the section of country which I represent, if the same legislation which gives it destroys the home market and deprives our manufacturers of an opportunity to dispose of their finished products?

The following anteconvention utterances of distinguished Democrats in 1892, in the light of the events of the past year, sound like the voice of prophecy, and I commend these prophecies, which are now history, to the thoughtful and serious consideration of Congress and the country:

I have frequent misgivings as to the wisdom of again putting me in nomination.—Grover Cleveland.

Grover Cleveland is the only man that could have led us to disaster.—Senator Blackburn.

Nominate Mr. Cleveland, and we march—through a slaughter house into an open grave.—Henry Watterson.

Mr. Cleveland by his message, for which I honor him, has challenged the protected industries of the country to a fight of extermination.—Senator Vest.

Mr. Chairman, if there is any doubt about the above utterances of distinguished Democrats being history that doubt will be entirely removed to the country and the world at the next Congressional and national election. [Laughter and applause.]

And I bid my distressed countrymen who are now suffering from Democratic rule, incompetency, and inefficiency to be of good courage. The country has learned a lesson that will not be forgotten by the living generation.

Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

The country will surely again return to the economic and financial policy of the Republican party, and the greatest Republic of all history, the Republic upon whose dominions the sun never sets, because evening twilight in Alaska gilds the rock-bound coast of Maine with the rays of the morning sun. I say this greatest Republic of all history, when the present Democratic nightmare shall have passed away, will again under Republican rule enter upon a history of glory, prosperity, and development unequaled in our past glorious history. [Applause].

And I conclude these remarks with the prayer of Daniel Webster at the laying of the corner stone of this extension to the Capitol, July 4, 1851, as follows:

And all here assembled, whether belonging to public or private life, with hearts devoutly thankful to Almighty God for the preservation of the liberty and happiness of the country, unite in sincere and fervent prayers that this deposit and the walls and arches, the domes and towers, the columns and entablatures now to be erected over it may endure forever. God save the United States of America.

[Loud applause onthe Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELL of Texas said: Mr. Chairman, the effect of tariff charges, or import duties, has probably been the theme of more thorough, exhaustive, and able discussions than any economic question which has engaged the attention of students, scholars, or statesmen, and it is impossible that anything could be added to the strength of the arguments with which the advocates of the conflicting theories on that subject have supported their respective positions; but the greatly improved methods of collecting statistics and the valuable experience of various countries under the different systems in recent years has rendered it possible to demonstrate the correctness of opinions which could formerly be upheld only by the force of reasoning.

In the remarks which I am about to sumbit I will not stray from the beaten paths, but I hope to be able to elucidate the subject under consideration by referring to and commenting upon certain facts and figures which were not available in previous discussions.

When individuals organized themselves into societies they conferred upon their government the right to take such portion of their property as might be necessary to enable it to execute the purposes for which it was formed. This is the power of taxation. It is an attribute of sovereignty, and one which is essential to the very existence of governments. The method of exercising this power by the imposition of imposts upon imports is called a tariff. There is no doubt of the authority of our Government to resort to this means of raising the revenue with which to meet its legitimate expenses, and it is generally conceded that no method has yet been devised by which the burdens of taxation can in this country be more equitably distributed than by a tariff when properly adjusted.

The question therefore naturally arises, in what way and for what purpose should the duties upon the importation of commodities be levied?

There are two kinds of tariff: one for revenue, and the other for protection. A tariff for revenue is one where the tolls are sufficiently low to permit the sale of imported goods without a loss. A tariff for protection is one where the tolls are so high as to prevent, under ordinary circumstances, the sale of imported goods without a loss.

If an article on which imposts are levied is imported, the duty collected passes into the national Treasury, and the consumer contributes to that amount to the support of the Government. This is a tax.

If an article on which an impost charge is levied is not imported, no revenue is derived from it; and the increased price which the consumer has to pay for it, in consequence of his not being allowed to buy in a cheaper market on account of the duty, is not a tax, but is a donation under the forms of law of the property of the purchaser of the article to its original owner. This is so abhorrent to our ideas of justice, and is so foreign to our conceptions of the proper functions of legislation, that, stripped of all collateral considerations, no one could be found to defend it; but, say its advocates, "the good results which follow and flow from a protective tariff more than compensate for its inherent injustice and admitted evils," and they cite the enormous accumulation of wealth in this country in support of their position. If the wonderful development of our resources in the last thirty years is attributable to the operation of the protective system which has prevailed during that time, it affords a strong argument in its favor; but if it can be shown that we have grown great in spite of that system, and that in consequence of it some sections and classes had prospered at the expense of other sections and classes, then no excuse can be found for its continuance.

Let us, then, see what has been the effect of our tariff laws. While legislation can not create property, it can transfer its ownership. I will illustrate this by taking, as an example, a pair of shoes which if purchased in England would cost, landed at New York, $1. The duty on them would be 25 cents. The purchaser of the shoes would have to give $1.25 for them. If he should buy the imported shoes, the Government has taken 25 cents of his money for its own purposes. If he should buy a similar pair of domestic make at, say, $1.20, the laws have taken 20 cents of his earnings and given it to another. It is entirely immaterial, so far as this branch of my argument is concerned, whether the additional 20 cents which the purchaser has been compelled to pay in consequence of the tariff charges inures to the ultimate benefit of the manufacturer or his employés.

The point I make is that the ownership of the 20 cents has by legislation been changed from the purchaser of the shoes to the manufacturer. I have not been able to learn the value of the boots and shoes which are consumed by the 65,000,000 people in the United States; but, as shown by the census of 1880, their value for that year was $193,477,412, and at the present time it certainly could not be less than $300,000,000 per annum. Of course, the cost of these articles is not enhanced by the tariff quite to the extent of the impost charges on them, for if so they would be imported; but the Statistical Abstract shows that the value of the boots and shoes imported for 1891 was $74,567.38; for 1892, $90,578.89, and for 1893, $95,662.42.

The duty on boots and shoes, as I have stated, is 25 per cent ad valorem, and the manufacturers tell us that they can not afford to make them if the tariff is reduced. This indicates that the cost of these articles is increased nearly to the amount of the duty by it. But, to be perfectly conservative, let us assume that we only have to pay 5 per cent more on the first cost of our boots and shoes than we would if it were not for the tariff. The people of this country, then, pay $15,000,000 per annum bounty on their boots and shoes, and the Government receives from the tariff which renders this necessary less than $25,000 in taxes.

It would not be practicable in the limited time which I am allowed to consume under the rules to investigate many of the items which are subjected to tariff charges; but at the risk of being tedious, I wish to consider its effect on a few more articles, and in doing so I will select those which are in the most common use. The duty on nails, spikes, and tacks ranges from 1½ to 4 cents per pound, being equivalent to an ad valorem charge of from 30 to 107 per cent, and the value of them imported during 1890 was $2,728.15; for 1891, $3,046.34; for 1892, $3,552.94. I am informed by the officers of the Census Bureau that the value of the nails manufactured by the establishments engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel during the census year was $12,333,603, but that as many establishments make nails that do not manufacture iron and steel, the actual output of nails in this country will largely exceed that amount.

It may be, then, safely assumed that the value of the nails, spikes, and tacks annually consumed in this country amounts to $30,000,000. The average import charges on these items is 48 per cent; but if the manufacturers realized only 10 per cent more for them than they would if it were not for the duty, they received $3,000,000 bounty on the nails, spikes, and tacks used by the people of the United States for the year 1892, while the Government obtained in taxes from the tariff on these articles $1,316.

On common screws the duty ranged from 5 to 14 cents per pound, or from 46 to 110 per cent ad valorem, and yet, during the year 1892 there was absolutely none imported. I have been unable to obtain any estimate of the value of the screws manufactured in this country, but for the year 1880 it was $2,184,894. If there has been no increase in the output of this industry, and if the cost of the screws was increased only 10 per cent by the tariff charges on them, the manufacturers collected a bounty of $218,489 from our people on this item, while the Government did not receive a cent of revenue from the tariff charges which rendered this possible.

Of course the articles which I have been discussing present extreme cases or there would be very little income obtained from the tariff, while as a matter of fact most of our revenue is derived from that source. But it is a notable fact that on almost all the articles which the necessities of the people compel them to have, the tariff charges are at present so high as to be prohibitory, but to make the injustice of the laws complete, on those articles which people buy only because they feel able to do so they are sufficiently low (as they should be on everything) to render it profitable to import them, and hence the purchasers are not deprived of the benefit of competition between home and foreign producers.

For instance, during the year 1892, the customs collected on wool hats amounted to $9,864.83; on silks, to $16,965,637.03; on blankets, to $4,872.48; on wines, to $5,058,661.71. In other words, the tariff on most of the necessaries of life is prohibitory, while on the luxuries it is on a revenue basis.

By the census it was ascertained that the value of the manufactured goods of domestic make subject to duty consumed by the people of the United States was annually in 1870, in round numbers, $3,000,000,000; in 1880, $6,000,000,000, while it is supposed that for 1890 the amount will exceed $8,000,000,000. If the average annual consumption of the protected articles for the past twenty years has been $6,000,000,000, the total for that period would be $120,000,000,000. The average of the imposts levied has during all that time exceeded 40 per cent ad valorem, but if the first cost of the goods was enhanced by them only 10 per cent, the bounty which one class of our citizens—the manufacturers—have been able to collect under the forms of law in the last twenty years, amounts to $12,000,000,000, and yet during the same time the Government collected from the tariff which enabled them to do so only $3,746,173,761.09, and nearly all of this from such luxuries as silks, wines, tobacco, diamonds, etc.

It will be observed that I have not been discussing the question as to the additional amount the consumer has been compelled to pay for the protected domestic products in consequence of the tariff charges, for that will be much more than the bounty which goes to the manufacturers. Every one who handles anything until it reaches the person who buys it for actual use will expect to make a profit on his entire investment which, in the case of a protected article, will include what might properly be called its legitimate cost and also the bounty paid on it. If, therefore, the wholesale merchant has to give $110 for goods which he could get for $100 but for the tariff, he will charge a profit on the $100 and also on the $10, and the retail merchant will charge a profit on the entire amount which he has paid the wholesale merchant, which will include the bounty and the profit on the bounty.

I am not sufficiently familiar with, and have not been able to learn enough about the per cent which the merchants add to the cost of the goods which they sell to enable me to form any satisfactory estimate of the profit on the bounty on the $120,000,000,000 worth of goods of domestic make consumed by our people in the last two decades, but it must be enormous.

If all of our citizens were engaged in avocations which enabled them to receive equal advantages from the imposts levied neither injury nor benefit would result from them; but a large majority of the inhabitants of this country can not, in the very nature of things, be profited by a tariff, because there is a surplus of what they produce, which must be exported. While the population, as shown by the census of 1890, has been made known, the number following the different pursuits has not yet been ascertained; but it may be safely assumed that the proportion of those engaged in the various callings is about the same as in 1880.

At that time, of the 17,392,099 of our people who were engaged in all kinds of business, 2,623,089 were employed in such manufacturing industries as it was claimed were benefited by a high tariff. Of the others 7,670,493 were employed in agriculture, 4,074,238 in professional and personal service, 1,800,258 in trade and transportation, and the butchers, carpenters, blacksmiths, tailors, masons, bakers, and persons in similar avocations numbered 1,214,023. To put it in another form: one-seventh of the laboring population of this country is engaged in industries which are supposed to be benefited by a protective tariff, while six-sevenths are employed in those which can not receive any advantage from tariff charges.

I will illustrate this by taking the case of a farmer, though the same thing is applicable to the lawyer, the doctor, the blacksmith, the carpenter, the railroad employé, and most others. It is a familiar maxim of political economy that the surplus of a commodity regulates its price. There is a duty of 20 cents a bushel on wheat. If last year we had not produced as much wheat as our necessities required, the growers could, and would, have held their crops until the price advanced to a point nearly equal to the value of the foreign article plus the transportation charges and impost duties. The tariff on wheat would then have benefited the wheat-raiser; but, as a matter of fact, we produced over 150,000,000 bushels more wheat than we could consume.

The owners of it were compelled to find a market for this surplus in some other country or allow it to go to ruin on their hands. When they sent it abroad they had to sell it in competition with the products of the foreign growers of similar produce. If the price obtained for the wheat sent abroad had been such as to realize to the shipper $1 per bushel, after deducting the charges on it, competition amongst the home buyers would have fixed the value of that which was consumed here as well as that which was to be exported at $1 per bushel, but when the consumers of wheat in foreign countries could obtain the supplies they needed from other sources at such prices that after deducting the charges only 60 cents per bushel could be realized for our wheat sent abroad, the price of that consumed in this country, as well as that exported, was correspondingly reduced.

This shows clearly that a tariff on an article can not enhance its price as long as there is more of it in the country levying the tariff than is needed there: and this is the case with nearly everything the farmers produce, such as cheese, butter, beef, bacon, lard, corn and other breadstuffs, cotton, etc. The farmer, then, must have the price of his products fixed in the foreign market, where he must come in competition with those who have been permitted to buy in a cheap or unprotected market. That is, the farmers in this country have been compelled, by the tariff, to pay, say, 10 per cent more than their competitors for all the articles covered by it which they and their families use.

I presume it will be admitted that the farmers work harder, live more economically, and utilize the services of their families to a greater extent than do any other class, and they might, therefore, reasonably expect that, at least, an equal proportion of the accumulating capital of the country would fall to their share; but as there has been for a number of years a protective tariff on nearly everything which they buy, if the theories I have been advancing are correct, this has not been the case.

The only benefits which it is claimed that the farmers derive from protection is that it is supposed to provide a market for such things as will not bear long shipments, like milk, vegetables, fruits, etc., and that it saves them freights on their other products. As most of the manufacturing establishments are located in New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, the farmers of that section would, if this is correct, receive the greatest benefit from our tariff system. The statistics collected under the census of 1890 have not yet been compiled, but I have been able to procure returns as to most of the States, and they disclose some startling results. While the assessed valuation of the property in the ten States which I have just named increased from 1880, when it was $9,094,289,423 to $12,403,167,633 in 1890, making an actual increase of $3,308,878,210, the value of the farm lands, including the fences and buildings on them, in the same States, decreased from $3,930,930,755 in 1880 to $3,585,938,744 in 1890, showing a net loss of $344,992,011.

The value of farms, like all other property, is regulated by their productive capacity. If a farm could be made to yield a revenue of 10 per cent per annum on the amount invested in it, after deducting all expenses, it would be worth just twice as much as if it could only be made to realize a net profit of 5 per cent. So, when we find that the value of the farms in the States spoken of have decreased as they have, we must look to the profits derived from them to account for the loss in their value.

In 1880 the value of the productions on the farms in the ten States that I have named was $597,557,645, while in 1890 their value had decreased to $551,541,564, making a net decrease of $46,016,081. And yet, during this time the value of the implements and machinery used on these farms had increased from $137,604,606 in 1880 to $146,343,598 in 1890, making a net increase of $8,738,992, and the value of the live stock on them from $389,848,579 in 1880 to $430,084,194 in 1890, making a net increase of $40,135,615. It will be seen, then, that while the owners of the farms in the section of the country upon the growth of which I have been commenting have had $48,000,000 more invested in machinery and live stock with which to make a profit on their holdings in 1890 than they had in 1880, still they actually realized $46,000,000 less on them than they did in 1880. There must be some reason for this deplorable state of affairs. It can not be possible that such an avocation as that of farming could grow less profitable each year without some cause.

It may be said that there was no possibility of an advance in farm values in these States because the farm lands were thoroughly developed in 1880. This would prove a reasonable explanation of the fact that there has been no great increase in the value of the farms, but it can not account for an actual decrease in their value. It must be observed, too, that I am not arguing here simply that the farmers are not receiving a just proportion of the increasing capital of the section of the country in which they are located, but I am showing that they have actually been suffering a loss. What explanation can be offered for this? When one class is less prosperous than another there must be some discrimination against it; and when we find that the farmers in the most favored region of the Union are not only not receiving any of the augmenting wealth of the country, but have been failing to keep what they had previously accumulated, we know that they must be laboring under some unnatural disadvantage.

What is this disadvantage? It can not be that the farmers, of whom I have been speaking, have been suffering from an insufficient volume of circulating medium with which to transact their business, because everyone knows that there is and has been an absolute plethora of money in the States where they live, and, besides, if that was the trouble, it would have affected all of those in the same section who are engaged in other productive callings; but some of them have been wonderfully prosperous. It can not be that the pension laws, the operation of which bear so heavily upon some other sections of our country, have caused the misfortunes of those of whom I speak, for they are to a greater extent than any other class the beneficiaries of those laws. It can not be that they are less industrious than their neighbors, or that they are more extravagant in their habits or mode of living, for it will not be questioned but that the farmers are the most industrious and economical of our citizens.

The only discrimination against the farmer is that he is compelled under the tariff laws to buy in a protected or high market, while, from the nature of his calling, he is compelled to sell in an unprotected or cheap market. When, therefore, we reason from cause to effect, we necessarily conclude that those of the inhabitants of our country who are the recipients of governmental favors are prospering at the expense of those who are not, and the correctness of this conclusion is substantiated not only by a comparison of the accumulations of those engaged in the different callings during the same periods, but of those in the same callings at times when such discriminations did and did not exist. From 1850 to 1860 the tariff was nearer on a strictly revenue basis than at any time in our history, and during that decade the value of the farms in the ten States already named increased from $1,813,767,398 to $2,800,081,466, a net increase of $986,314,068, while all of the property in those States increased in value from $3,635,715,971 to $6,785,505,845. This shows that under that system each class received something like a just proportion of the aggregate earnings of the entire population.

But, convincing as are the figures I have just cited as to the injurious effects of our legislation upon a large class of our citizens, they are not more so than are the same character of statistics when extended to the entire country. According to the estimate of the Superintendent of the Census the wealth of the United States increased from 1880 to 1890, $20,000,000,000, while the value of the farms increased $3,080,000,000. During the same decade the value of the farm products increased $246,000,000, while the value of the farming implements and the live stock used on the farms increased $1,577,000,000. When it is remembered that those engaged in agriculture constitute about one-half of our population, it will be seen that there is for some reason a very uneven distribution of the accumulations of the wealth-producing forces of the nation. This was not the case formerly. Between 1850 and 1860 our country was not afflicted with a protective tariff, and the value of the property in the United States increased from $7,135,780,228 to $16,159,616,068, while the value of the farms increased from $3,271,575,426 to $6,645,045,007.

These well authenticated and undisputed statistics prove beyond controversy that under a low or revenue tariff those to whose energy and enterprise we are indebted for our marvelous growth, received the just reward of their toil and frugality, while under a high or protective tariff the fruits of their industry and economy are transferred to others.

But the protective system has not been more unjust or more discriminating in its operation upon individuals and classes than upon sections. From 1880 to 1890 the assessed valuation of property in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, the principal manufacturing States of the Union, increased exclusive of farming properties $1,529,442,166, while the assessed valuations in the agricultural states of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas increased, including farm values, city property, railroads, and everything else, only $1,428,969,834 during the same time, and yet the population in the sixteen States named increased 3,729,709, as against 1,430,981 in the two States.

When it is remembered that the inhabitants of these different sections are of similar intelligence, industry, and habits, it must be conceded that there has been some unnatural cause for the fearful disparity in their relative prosperity as shown by these figures. What can be this unnatural cause? I can imagine none except that those living in one section have been receiving the benefits of protection, while those living in the other have been suffering from its unjust and injurious operations.

I wish next to consider the effect of a protective tariff upon manufacturing enterprises, and in this connection I remind you that the Anglo-Saxon inhabitants of America are preëminently a manufacturing people. From the first settlement of the country, equally with the sister arts of agriculture and commerce, our manufactures, without any adventitious aids, advanced with the increase of population. As early as 1708 complaint was made to the British Parliament by the English manufacturers that three-fourths of the linens and woolens used in the province of New York were made there, and similar complaints were subsequently preferred against the other colonies. It was the efforts of the mother country to suppress their growing manufactories more than anything else which caused our ancestors to withdraw their allegiance from her.

For the decade beginning 1850, during which a strictly revenue tariff prevailed, the value of the products of our manufactories increased from $553,000,000 to $1,009,000,000, or at the rate of 90 per cent, while our population increased only 35 per cent. So it appears that the development of our manufactories has been continuous regardless of tariff legislation. And why should not this be the case? Our mechanics are confessedly the most intelligent in the world. They use labor-saving machinery to a greater extent than do the mechanics of any other country. And, after all, the marvelous inventions of recent years have reduced the issue of competition to the question of who can utilize to the greatest advantage the most labor-saving machinery.

A very small proportion of the inhabitants of the earth are capable of using to any great extent the complicated machinery which is being made to do the work formerly done by human hands. It is for this reason that the artisans of the United Kingdom are able to supply with manufactured products the markets of nations which have far greater natural advantages.

I do not question but that protection enables manufacturers to obtain better prices for their products, if they do not produce more than enough to supply the home market, but I do deny that it promotes their permanent prosperity.

As I have already shown, if there is less of a commodity, on which there is a tariff, produced in a country than is consumed, the owners of it can realize for it the cost of similar products in other countries plus the transportation charges and nearly the amount of the duty. If, however, the supply should exceed the demand, competition amongst the owners of the commodity would cause the price to decline until they could only obtain the cost of their possessions and a reasonable compensation for the use of their capital invested and for their personal services. It is, therefore, to the interest of the manufacturers of any article which is subject to a duty to keep down such competition at home as would prevent them from realizing the full benefit of the tariff rather than to extend their business to the utmost limit and secure foreign markets for the surplus products of their industry.

Hence it is that the manufacturers in so many lines have limited the output of their plants by the formation of trusts or the organization of combines. The effect of this on their employés I will discuss later on, but its injurious effect upon manufactories will be perceived at once. Instead of causing our manufacturers to strike out in manful strife and defiantly demand a share of the markets of the world it has caused them to content themselves with a monopoly of the markets of one country.

But we are told that our manufacturers can not compete with the English, and that if the tariff is materially lowered, they will be ruined. Let us see if their fears are well founded. The reason assigned by our manufacturers for their inability to compete with foreigners is because they pay higher wages to their employés. It is undoubtedly a fact that laborers of all kinds receive better compensation in this country than elsewhere, if we estimate it in money, by the week; but if we estimate their compensation by the results accomplished, then such is not the case. This is because of the greater intelligence and efficiency of our laborers, the more extensive use of machinery in this country, and the longer time which our mechanics work in a week. I will try to make this plain by illustrating with the boot and shoe industry, though what I say of it will apply equally well to others.

I find in Harper's Magazine a very well written article, in which an intelligent writer makes a careful estimate of the comparative labor cost in this country and in England of certain articles. The results of his investigations show as follows:

American ladies' shoes, wholesaling at $1.50 per pair, cost for labor of making, 25 cents; English-made ladies' shoes, wholesaling at $1.50 per pair, cost for labor of making, 34 cents; American-made men's shoes, wholesaling at $2.60 per pair, cost for labor of making, 33 cents; English-made men's shoes, wholesaling at $2.60 per pair, cost for labor of making, 50 cents.

This corresponds with all the estimates I have seen on the subject. It shows that the American manufacturer actually obtains his labor for less than his competitor, and that in that respect he is prepared to successfully compete in the open markets with his rival. For the year 1892 we exported to the United Kingdom upper leather of the value of $3,379,659 and sole leather of the value of $4,314,121, while for the same period we imported from that country upper leather of the value of $9,927 and sole leather of the value of $20,783. This proves that leather is more costly in Great Britain than in the United States, for if it was not it would not be shipped from this country to that.

As leather is the only material used in making boots and shoes the cost of which is worth considering, it follows that the American manufacturer of those articles obtains his materials at least as cheaply as do those engaged in the same industry in England, and yet the value of the boots and shoes exported from the United States for the year 1892 was only $914,974, and the total value of all manufactures of leather $1,566,418, while there was exported from the United Kingdom for the year 1891 to Brazil alone manufactures of leather of the value of $1,299,961.

Mr. MORSE. I would like to remark to the gentleman that there is a reason why American manufacturers sell goods abroad cheaper than they do in this country, a reason which operates for the benefit of American workingmen, by allowing the manufacturers to work off their surplus products, and thus to give additional employment to their operatives, often upon newer styles of goods.

Mr. BELL of Texas. The gentleman misunderstood me. I was stating as a matter of fact that they do not send their goods abroad.

Mr. MORSE. Then I did misunderstand the gentleman.

Mr. BELL of Texas. I state that as a matter of fact the value of manufactures of leather sent abroad by the manufacturers of this country is only about a million and a half a year, while England sends to Brazil alone a million and a quarter of such manufactures.

Mr. MORSE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the argument is frequently made on the other side against protection that American manufacturers sell goods cheaper abroad than they do at home, and I wanted to explain that.

Mr. BELL of Texas. I do not care to yield for that purpose just now, because my time is so limited. I see that the gentleman has fallen into an error as to my line of argument.

When we consider that our manufacturers of leather have an advantage of others in the cost of material and in the relative labor cost, in what way can we account for their surrender of the valuable markets for their products except on the theory that they are limiting the output of articles in that line so as to prevent an oversupply in the home market? In other words, it appears that they prefer making fewer articles at a larger profit to making more at a less profit, even if the aggregate gain should be greater.

What is true with reference to the one industry of which I have been speaking is also true of most others. Formerly, when a very large part of the work was done by hand, the labor cost of the finished product represented a much larger proportion of the cost of the article than at present. The various items which go to make up the cost of the finished manufactured product is discussed very fully in the Report of Statistics of Labor for Massachusetts for the year 1890.

This is a very valuable work, and I expect to quote from it frequently. So far as I can discover it deals fairly and candidly with the subjects of which it treats. It certainly can not be suspected of any prejudice against protection, for the arguments in it are all in favor of a protective tariff, though, as I say, I think the facts and figures given are correctly stated. According to this report the labor cost of all the articles manufactured in Massachusetts at the time it was published was 24.87 per cent of the value of the finished product.

The cost of material in some industries is enhanced by the tariff while in others it is not, but the disastrous effects of protection, so far as our foreign commerce is concerned, extends to nearly every manufactured product. For instance, take the item of cotton goods. As we are the greatest cotton-exporting country our manufacturers can obtain their raw materials cheaper than can others. If there is any enterprise in which they ought to outstrip all competitors it is in this, and when they were not hampered by restrictive laws, and when their enterprize was not stunted by the unnatural advantages conferred upon them, they were rapidly doing so.

As I have frequently stated, between 1850 and 1860 we had a low or revenue tariff, but between 1880 and 1890 we had a high or protective tariff. The value of the manufactures of cotton exported from the United States increased from $4,734,424 in 1850 to $10,934,796 in 1860, while it decreased from $10,467,651 in 1880 to $9,999,277 in 1890. Hence, it is clear that under a low tariff we were rapidly becoming the great cotton manufacturing nation, but under a high tariff we have been losing the prestige we had gained. Why is this? Were the circumstances surrounding the industries materially different during the two periods? At each time we had an advantage in the cost of raw materials equal to the expense of shipping it across the ocean.

In the latter decade we had been paying higher wages than did our competitors, but so we did in the former. Our monetary standard was in each instance the same. So far as the volume of money can contribute to the prosperity of a people the advantage was all in favor of the later period, for the greatest circulation at any time from 1850 to 1860 was $12.85 per capita, while from 1880 to 1890 the lowest was $19.41. We did not suffer during either of the decades compared from any general plague or pestilence and we were at peace with the world.

The friends of the protective system attribute much of the growth of our manufactures between 1850 and 1860 to the fact that the European nations were engaged in the Crimean war during a part of that time. The Crimean war lasted from March, 1854, to April, 1856, while the growth of our manufactures and the expansion of our foreign commerce preserved about the same proportion each year for the entire decade, except that in 1858 they declined in consequence of the monetary disturbance of 1857. But it might be supposed that the other nations were manufacturing their cotton goods, and that that was the reason of the falling off in our exports in that line. In order to show that this is not the case, and also to show the extent of the markets we have surrendered, I will give the figures on the importations of a few countries.

The value of the manufactures of cotton imported for the year 1891 was, into Mexico from the United States, $602,382; from the United Kingdom, $2,772,506. Into Brazil from the United States, $803,700; from the United Kingdom, $12,499,274. Into the Argentines from the United States, $779,246; from the United Kingdom, $8,216,730. And the proportion is about the same when applied to the other importing nations. In what way can we account for the abandonment of these markets by our manufacturers except upon the theory that they find the monopoly of the home market so satisfactory that they supinely content themselves with it.

What is true of the two industries which I have used as illustrations is true of most others; but I think a comparison of the growth of those I have mentioned under the different systems of tariff charges will suffice to refute the claim that our manufactories have been in any way benefited by protection.

But there is one other industry to which I desire to call special attention. There had been a tariff of 20 per cent on quinine prior to July, 1879, when it was placed on the free list. I have been unable to obtain any information of the amount of quinine manufactured in the United States at any time, because, in taking the census, it is not separated from certain other medicines, but it is manufactured from cincona and other barks, none of which are found in this country, and since an accurate account is kept of all importations, and since the barks to which I have referred are not used for any other purpose except to convert into quinine, we can calculate with reasonable certainty as to the amount of quinine manufactured at different periods. There was imported of the barks which I will designate under the general head of cincona, in 1876, 5,280,150 pounds; in 1877, 1,760,445 pounds; in 1878, 4,826,290 pounds; in 1879, 6,387,378 pounds.

This will afford some idea of the extent of the industry we are considering at the time of the repeal of the law imposing a tariff on its products. While the bill to repeal the duty was pending the usual cry of the beneficiaries of governmental favor was raised, and a doleful picture of the ruin which was about to be inflicted upon them was drawn; but, nevertheless, we find that about the same output of quinine from the American factories has continued. The cinchona imported for 1880 was 6,013,877 pounds; for 1881, 4,219,403; for 1882, 5,010,547, and while for some years the amount imported has been less, and for others more, the average has been greater since the tariff on quinine was repealed than before, which shows that the manufacturers of quinine in this country have been, and are, able to compete with foreign manufacturers. And they have been doing so in spite of the most unjust discriminations, for on the alcohol used by them in the process of manufacturing they have had to pay an internal-revenue tax equivalent to $1.70 per gallon, while their European competitors obtained their solvents free of any similar charge.

It is a familiar claim of the protectionists that the prices of protected products are lower than they were formerly because of protection. They argue that because steel rails were selling at $120 per ton when the law was passed which imposed a very heavy duty on rails, and are now selling at $29 per ton, the reduction was caused by the stimulation in the production of the rails occasioned by the duty on them. If this theory be correct how are we to account for the decrease in the price of quinine? As I am informed by the Statistician of the Treasury Department, that in 1877, quinine commanded $4.50 an ounce; in 1878, $3.60; in 1880, $2.50; while in 1890 it could be obtained for 44 cents an ounce. As a matter of fact the decline in the price of quinine was occasioned by the improved methods of making it and by the great decline in the cost of cincona, and was not affected by the tariff. The same thing is true as to steel rails and other protected products.

But whatever may have been the cause of it, it is an undoubted fact that the ability of the American people to produce has outgrown their capacity to consume. We must, therefore, either find foreign markets for our manufactured goods, as we have for our agricultural products, or we must be content to not only not extend our manufactures, but to abandon some of those we now have. The suggestion that we ought to continue any policy which would retard our industrial development ought to be received with no favor by a people whose energy, ingenuity, and enterprise in peace has only been equaled by their valor and patriotism in war.

It was to have been expected that the efforts to reduce the tariff to a revenue basis would meet with opposition from those who have been accustomed to look to the Government instead of to rely upon themselves to promote their prosperity. And here history but repeats itself. The reforms in her tariff which enabled the United Kingdom to become the unquestioned commercial nation of the world were effected after the most stubborn contest, and yet no party which would suggest a return to the old system could now obtain a following in that country. When the low tariff of 1846 was proposed, the same cries which now fill the land were heard on every hand. It was said that the passage of that law meant the destruction of our manufactures, the debasement of our labor, and the general ruin of our country. Every representative of the four principal manufacturing States of New England voted against it. After the beneficial effects of the change had been demonstrated when in 1857 a proposition was made to reduce the duties still further, practically all the representatives of those States favored it. Mr. Blaine, in his history, says:

> This act (the tariff act of 1857) was well received by the people, and, indeed, was concurred in by a considerable portion of the Republican party.

May we not reasonably hope that when the beneficent results which will flow from the adoption of the policy of the party now in power manifest themselves we will have the earnest coöperation of the bitterest opponents of the measure under discussion in making the further reduction in our tariff rates which will surely follow?

I do not contend that protection inures to the advantage of those engaged in all kinds of protected industries, for the experience of the past clearly demonstrates that it does not. This is particularly the case with the wool-grower, as will be shown by comparing the prices obtained for their clip in this country at different times and the amount realized here and in England for the same grades of wool at the same time.

This subject was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Ways and Means of the Fifty-second Congress, and the result was embodied in a very interesting report. There had never been a high tariff on wool in this country prior to 1867, when the duty was fixed at from 10 to 12 cents per pound and at 10 to 11 per cent ad valorem, and while the rates have been slightly changed at different times since, they have always been very great; yet, as is shown in the report to which I refer, the average price realized for fine washed clothing wool for the ten years ending with 1860 was 50.8 cents per pound, and for coarse washed clothing wool was 38.2 cents per pound, while for the ten years ending with 1890 the average price realized for fine washed clothing wool was 34.1 and for coarse washed clothing wool 24.4 cents per pound.

Perhaps no better illustration could be given of the impracticability of forcing people into any calling by law than that which sheep husbandry affords. In 1868, when the high tariff on wool went into effect, there were in the United States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers 37,864,600 sheep, and this number has decreased year by year until in 1891 there were in these States only 18,476,400. It will be observed that the time selected for making this comparison could not be more favorable for the sheep business, because the States referred to included those which had suffered most from the ravages of war, and in 1868 they had not had time to recuperate and regain their normal supply of sheep, and they accordingly show an increase, which, however, is more than offset by enormous decrease in the other States.

The showing in some of the States and Territories where they could obtain the free use of Government land is much better. For instance, in Montana the number of sheep increased from 2,000 in 1870 to 2,000,000 in 1891, and in Utah the increase for that time was about the same. The total number of sheep in the United States in 1868 was in round numbers 39,000,000, and in 1891 41,000,000. In other words, while the population of this country has about doubled in the last twenty-four years, the number of sheep has increased only 4,000,000.

The theory on which protectionists formerly justified their doctrine was that they were in favor of fostering infant industries until they could meet foreign competition. The wool-growers have had the benefit of the highest protection for twenty-four years, and yet the price of their product has been growing lower and the number of their sheep, except in a few favored localities, has been growing less all the time. When we had no or a low tariff on wool the increase in the number of sheep kept pace with the increase of population. Since we have had protection the number of sheep, in proportion to our population and the price realized for wool, have both decreased. Why is this? Like every result there is a cause for it, which we can find if we will investigate carefully.

The report of the committee to which I have referred shows the relative price in this country and in England of washed wool of the grades grown in the United States from 1867 to 1891. The average for the whole time was in England, where there has been no duty on it, 41.08 cents per pound; in America, where there has been a high duty all that time, it was 41.48 cents per pound; but most of the time the price in Philadelphia and Boston was less than in London. At first sight this would seem somewhat singular, but the reason for it is susceptible of a satisfactory explanation. We only grow one grade of wool in the United States, and in order to render that suitable for manufacturing into most kinds of woolen goods it is necessary to mix it with certain coarser grades of wool, which must be imported. The duty on this is so great that the American manufacturer of woolen goods is absolutely barred out of foreign markets.

There is, therefore, no demand here for more wool than enough to make the product sufficient for our local wants, and since the supply of the kinds of wool grown in this country exceeds the demand for it it follows that its price is fixed by the amount which could be realized for it in a foreign country. That is, the seller would not take less for it than he could obtain for it by shipping it abroad, and the purchaser not being compelled to have it will not give more. Of course the same law of supply and demand which regulates the price of everything else affects the price of wool, and hence we find that sometimes when the supply is limited and the demand great the wool-grower realizes an enhanced price for his product in consequence of protection.

For instance, during the years 1871 and 1872, owing to the temporarily increased demand occasioned by the tariff of 1867, the average price of American wool in Boston was 10 cents per pound greater than was the price of the same grade of wool in London; while if we except these two years the average price for the remaining twenty-two years between 1867 and 1891 has been greater in London than in Boston. If the wool-growers could organize a trust and limit the quantity of wool produced, or withhold it until the manufacturers were compelled to buy, they could realize for it the price of the foreign article, plus the transportation charges and nearly the amount of the duty on similar wool; but, as it is impossible for them to do so, whenever they grow more wool of any kind than is needed in this country, the competition between the sellers of it reduces the price. This seems to be a sufficient explanation of the well-established fact that wool commanded a better price in this country under a low than under a high tariff, and that its average price has been about the same in Boston where we have had a high tariff, as in London where they have had none.

But, it may be asked, why has not the consumption of wool increased in proportion to the growth of our population? The answer to this is very clear. In consequence of the high price of woolens in comparison with other things the poorer class of our people have been using other kinds of goods and our manufacturers have been using substitutes for wool. As an evidence of this, look at the development of the shoddy industry, a business which would perhaps never have had an existence, and which certainly could never have attained its present proportions but for the exorbitant price which our manufacturers have obtained on their woolen goods. The value of the manufactures of shoddy in the United States increased to $9,208,011 in 1890, from $1,767,592 in 1870. There was grown in the United States for 1890 only 92,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, and there was used during the same year in the manufacture of woolen goods in this country 61,626,261 pounds of shoddy. When it is considered that shoddy is only one of the substitutes for wool which is used in the manufacture of woolens the decreased demand for wool will be readily understood.

But there is another reason—and, in my judgment, a convincing one—why protection can not permanently benefit the wool-grower. Woolen goods are so indispensable not only to the comfort, but to the health of those living in the latitude covered by the United States, that there never can be a permanent policy adopted which does not procure for our people the best goods for the least money. If, therefore, the tariff on wool enhanced its price there would be a continual agitation at each election for the repeal of the duty on it which would keep the industry in such a state of uncertainty that no wool-grower could make a reasonably accurate calculation on his income a year in advance.

This applies to all kinds of protected avocations, but to none with so much force as to wool-growing; because, owing to the absolute necessity for the use of woolens, the effort to have them cheapened will be so great, and because from the nature of their business the wool-growers can least of all guard against an oversupply of their products. If the manufacturers of woolens find that there is about to be a surplus of their outputs they can and do close down their mills until the stock on hand is reduced to such proportions as they desire, and the only loss they sustain in the meantime is the interest on their investment. On the other hand, the expense of the wool-growers is the same, regardless of the price they obtain for their wool; and if they realize that they are causing an overproduction of their product there is no way in which they can check it except by exterminating their flocks. If they attempt to do that there is an oversupply of mutton, and they can not sell their sheep. For these reasons I think it plain that protection has not and will not benefit the wool-grower.

The next point to which I wish to invite attention is as to the effect tariff charges have on the wages of those engaged in industries which are supposed to receive the benefit of protection. Of course the more the manufacturers realize for their products, the more they could afford to pay their employés; but manufacturers are like other people, and get whatever they have to buy as cheaply as they can and sell whatever they have to sell for as much as possible. It is conceded that wages are higher in the United States than anywhere else, and the protectionists claim that it is so because of protection. A complete answer to this is found in the fact that wages were much higher here than in foreign countries before our protective system was adopted, and are much higher in England, where they have free trade, than in Germany or France, where they have protection; but the truth is that wages are regulated by the supply of and demand for the service of the laborers.

If there were not enough mechanics in this country to do the necessary work in any particular trade, those who were here could command almost any price for their services until their high wages would cause their numbers to be increased by immigration or by others taking up their calling; but if a part of the mechanics could do the work in their line, the competition would cut down the price until the wages would become so low that a portion of them would have to seek other fields of employment. In this way the equilibrium between the demand for and supply of laborers is regulated. When it is considered that over one-half of the manual laborers in this country are engaged in agricultural pursuits, it will be perceived that anything which reduces the returns for agricultural services and diverts m ny from that calling must necessarily produce competition which will cause a reduction in the wages of those engaged in all the other avocations.

If, therefore, the farmers of this country were relieved of all unnecessary burdens, and allowed to buy their supplies where they could be had the cheapest, the increased profit of agriculture would enable laborers in all other callings to command better wages, and would result in loss to none except to those manufacturers who in consequence of protection have curtailed competition in the output of their products by the formation of trusts.

This proposition is too clear to admit of dispute or doubt, but I am prepared to support it, as I have all others that I have made, by an appeal to authenticated facts of history. I will present figures showing a comparison of the increase of wages during times when we had, and when we did not have, a high tariff, and also the increase in wages at the same time in countries where different tariff systems prevailed.

The report of the statistics of labor for Massachusetts for 1885 contains a comparison of the wages received in the United States at different periods in the various callings and brings the comparison up to 1883. As I have frequently stated, from 1850 to 1860 we had a low or revenue tariff, while from 1860 to 1883 we had a high or protective tariff. No periods could be selected which would have been more favorable for a comparison than those named, for the war between the States had not become a disturbing factor in 1860 and had ceased to be such in 1883. The increase of wages in most avocations was greater in the ten years when we had a low than in the twenty-three years when we had a high tariff.

I will give a few examples:

	1850.	1860.	1883.
Carpenters received for a day's work	$1.37	$2.03	$2.41
Glass-makers received for a day's work	2.44	2.96	2.01
Machinists received for a day's work	1.62	2.15	2.25
Painters received for a day's work	1.47	1.85	1.97
Shipbuilders received for a day's work	1.35	3.65	3.25
Tanners received for a day's work	1.13	1.67	1.86

These will suffice to show that the increase of wages has neither been dependent upon nor advanced by our protective system.

The report from which I have obtained these statistics shows that the wages of workmen in only three industries in the United States had declined in 1860 as compared with 1850, while the wages of workmen in 118 industries had declined in 1883 as compared with 1860. But it might be suggested that for some reason there was an abnormal increase in wages during the decade ending in 1860.

As a matter of fact, wages have shown an upward tendency from the earliest recorded time. The progress has been broken at intervals by calamities which have checked the onward current, but as soon as the financial embarrassments which seem to visit all countries with periodical regularity have ceased to exercise a depressing influence, the upward flow has continued. This will be made to appear very clearly by comparing the increase of wages in any one calling for a long period. I will take the wages of a blacksmith as an illustration. A blacksmith received for a day's work in 1820, 84 cents; in 1830, $1.12; in 1840, $1.40; in 1850, $1.47; in 1860, $1.69; in 1883, $1.92.

The experience of our country alone is sufficient to establish the correctness of the statement that wages have advanced, not in consequence of, but in spite of legislation; but this position can be fortified by comparing the increase of wages in other countries where they have had a different tariff system. The advance in wages in Great Britain, which had been continuous while they adhered to the protective system, was not only not checked but was accelerated when they embraced the more liberal doctrines of free trade.

In order to form a comparison of the growth of wages here and in Great Britain, the compilers of the excellent report to which I have referred investigated the wages paid in a given number of industries in the two countries from 1872 to 1883, and the result ascertained was that in 46.21 per cent of the industries investigated in Massachusetts there had been an increase of wages, while in 53.79 per cent there had been a decrease. In Great Britain in 44.42 per cent there had been an advance, and in 55.58 per cent there had been a decrease, but the average of all the wages in the callings investigated for the time mentioned showed an advance of 9.74 per cent in Great Britain, while in Massachusetts it showed a loss of 5.41 per cent.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes, sir; if it is not too long.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman's statement be true, how does he account for the petitions from all the workingmen of this country pouring in against this change in the tariff?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I do not concede that to be the fact at all. I understand that some of the working people of this country, so far as they can be threatened and coerced and bulldozed into it by the manufacturers, have sent in some such petitions. [Applause on the Democratic side and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind visitors in the galleries that they are not at liberty to applaud. They are here by the courtesy of the House and must observe order.

Mr. MORSE. I would like to remark to the gentleman from Texas that I represented numerous petitions from workingmen who were not bulldozed.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Oh, I do not doubt that there may be individual instances of that kind.

Mr. MORSE. Petitions from half a million workingmen.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Well, there may be half a million even who have sent in such petitions; but, while that may be true, I dare say, it is also a fact that there are hundreds and thousands and millions of the working people of this country who have expressed themselves at the ballot box and elsewhere in favor of the reversal of the system under which we have come so near to ruin. The people of the country have expressed themselves in that way by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. MORSE. Last fall? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes, last fall and the fall before, and time and time again in the past, as they probably will do very frequently hereafter, whenever an election is held presenting the issue on which the members of this House were elected. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, when it is remembered that in Great Britain they had no new land to be opened up and no new channels of employment into which their surplus labor could be diverted, as we have had, it will be perceived that a stronger showing than this could not be made against the restrictive system which we have so long maintained, as is now claimed in the interest of labor.

As I have stated, weekly wages have always been much higher in America than in England, but there are a number of differences in the economic conditions prevailing in the countries which render a comparison on this line very unsatisfactory. The American mechanic works 12 per cent longer on an average in a week than does his English rival, while he has much less steady employment. These two items alone are sufficient to prevent us from being able to determine absolutely the relative earnings of those engaged in the same lines of industry here and there, as expressed in money, but after all, it is not the rate of money wages which concerns the workmen so much, as what might be termed real wages, or the amount of subsistence obtainable for a given amount of labor.

If tariff charges do not enhance the price of products, they certainly do not benefit the manufacturer, and do not enable him to pay his employés better wages. If they do enhance the price of the finished products, the laborer has to pay more for the proportion of them which he consumes than does his competitor, and hence it is very doubtful if our mechanics do really receive better wages than do foreigners of equal skill engaged in the same callings. A strong evidence that they do not is found in the fact that very few mechanics immigrate to the United States. As our laws are much more liberal than those of other countries, especially in the educational advantages afforded the poor, if we were paying much better wages in mechanical pursuits than could be obtained elsewhere, we would receive a large immigration of skilled workmen; but nearly all of our immigrants are either farmers or laborers who engage in other avocations in which they can realize no benefit from protection.

Another consideration of the greatest importance to all persons, and particularly to those who must depend upon their wages to maintain themselves, is the steadiness of their employment. If a mechanic obtains a very high price for his work, but is idle most of the time, he will soon consume all he has earned while he was engaged. Manifestly the more extended the market the less likely it is to become oversupplied. There might be, and doubtless has many times been, more of a certain article produced than the whole world could consume; and in such case there is absolutely no remedy except to curtail production until the stock in existence is used up. In the mean time, those engaged in producing that commodity would have to remain idle or resort to some other employment. I have already shown how an oversupply of anything will prevent the owner of it from obtaining the benefit of the tariff on similar articles.

In order that they may realize the highest possible price for their products the manufacturers must keep the supply so limited that competition among themselves will not reduce it. When our manufactories were in their infancy and could not make as many goods as we needed, there was no occasion for our manufacturers to guard against an oversupply. Now, however, since they are able to turn out more than our people can use, whenever the quantity of their commodities is too large, instead of sending them to foreign markets, they close up their factories and throw out of work their employés. This same thing might happen if our markets were more extended, but it would be less likely to when we have access to the markets of the world for our manufactured products than when we are restricted to one market.

I think that I have shown very clearly that our protective system has not resulted, and can not result, in any advantage to the employés engaged in those industries which are supposed to be benefited by it. But if such was the case, and if every cent of the enhanced cost of the products of our factories caused by protection was paid directly to the laborers who made them, I would not abate one particle in my opposition to the system. If I should my memory would revert to the honest, patient, and laborious cotton-growers, working in an almost tropical sun, and requiring the assistance of all the members of their families, in order that they might overcome in the free markets of the world the competition of the poorest paid labor known to man. It seems as if the American mechanic would spurn the insinuation that he is unable to successfully contend with foreign competitors when his countrymen in other callings have under the most adverse circumstances, and in spite of the most oppressive governmental burdens, demonstrated their ability to defy all opposition. Let me show how this has been done.

Twenty-eight years ago the inhabitants of the cotton-growing section of the United States had just passed through the most disastrous experience with which any people have been afflicted in modern times. Their stock had been stolen or confiscated; their buildings burned; their fences destroyed; their farms turned into waste places. They had no supplies for the coming year and no credit with which to obtain them. Thousands and tens of thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands, of the flower of the land had perished on the battlefield or wasted away in Federal prisons. Those who by education, intelligence, and experience were alone prepared to direct public affairs were disfranchised, and the most superstitious, ignorant, and easily imposed upon of people were invested with the ballot.

By a series of legislative enactments, the most cruel which have ever disgraced the annals of civilization, the management of their local concerns were turned over for years to unscrupulous adventurers, whose interest in those they governed was limited by the amount they could steal from them and from whose peculations more injury resulted than from the four years of relentless war. Thus handicapped the Southern people entered the race for supremacy in the production of cotton, and for the year 1868 grew 2,652,000 bales, while India, Egypt, and all other countries furnished 2,564,000 bales. It will be seen that we then supplied about one-half of the raw cotton for the world. Three years later the proportion had been slightly changed, for in 1871 the United States furnished 3,241,000 as against 3,036,000 supplied by all other countries. But the real struggle had hardly begun. Like the athletes of old, the Southern people girded up their loins for a renewed contest, and relying on their individual manhood, and looking to the Government for nothing, distanced all comers.

In 1881 they produced 6,073,000 bales of cotton, while all the other countries produced 2,500,000 bales, and still maintaining their lead in 1891 they furnished 10,800,000 out of a total supply of 14,190,000 bales. And yet we are told that the American laborer can not compete with foreigners. Pray, who are the American laborers if the cotton-growers are not? They have competed with foreigners and have taken from them their markets, and while they were doing so have been subject to the most grievous burdens. They have had to pay a bonus on the implements with which they cultivate their crops; on the machinery with which they rendered their cotton available, and on the very bagging and ties with which they prepared it for shipment. They have had to pay a bounty on everything worn or used by them or their families; on all materials used in building their houses, their barns, and their fences; and yet the value of the exports of the raw cotton produced by them from 1866 to 1893 was $5,925,932,320.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if those workingmen of whom he is speaking now have been sending up petitions against a change in the tariff?

Mr. BELL of Texas. They! No, sir; they are only sending such petitions as they have always sent, just asking us to give them a fair show and no favor. That is all in God's world they have ever asked or ever will ask. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would like to ask the gentleman what rate of wages those men get who are employed in producing the cotton that competes with the cheap labor of India. And does the gentleman desire to reduce the intelligent white labor of this country to the same conditions that exist in India?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I will answer that. It is the intelligent white laborer that is now competing successfully in the markets of the world in the production of cotton.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What rate of wages is paid to the labor which produces in the gentleman's State the cotton that comes into competition with the India cotton?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Of course, the wages paid there are just whatever——

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What rate of wages is paid per day or per month?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Of course, the men working on those farms get whatever——

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How much do they get per day or per month?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Of course, I am not prepared to answer such a question. I do not know precisely what they get. But I do know as a matter of fact that they have to pay 25 per cent tax on the shoes which they buy, a tax which goes not to the support of the Government, but to the manufacturer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to answer my question?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I am not able to do so in exact terms.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does not the gentleman know it to be true that this labor in his State to which he has referred is not paid per month or per day the wages that is paid for the same kind of labor performed in the North and West by white men?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I suppose the wages are substantially the same, or the laborers in other sections would come to our country.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The same rate of wages?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Substantially. Of course, I do not suppose that farm laborers are paid so much anywhere in this country as skilled labor receives; but I suppose that farm labor throughout the country is paid about the same that is paid in the State of Texas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is it not true that such labor in your State is not paid more than $10 or $12 a month?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I think that is about correct.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have heard it so stated here frequently by Representatives from your State.

Mr. HEINER of Pennsylvania. May I put an inquiry to the gentleman?

Mr. BELL of Texas. You may if you will be quick, for my time is very limited.

Mr. HEINER of Pennsylvania. Are the laboring men you speak of represented on the floor of this House?

Mr. BELL of Texas. They are. I presume the gentleman imagines that the laboring men who make cotton in Texas are colored people. If that is his supposition it is simply an illustration of the want of information which gentlemen on the other side have in regard to our affairs in the South. Let me say here that the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor has probably fewer colored voters in it than the district represented by any gentleman on the other side of the House. There is one county in my district which cast last year 3,500 votes, and which has not a single colored man in it. I do not mean to say merely that a colored vote was not cast, but that there is no colored man in the county; and that county shipped last year 25,000 bales of cotton. In the county in which I have lived for the last eighteen years there was only one colored man residing at the last election. I do not mean only one colored man voting, but only one living there. The ignorance of some gentlemen on the other side in regard to the condition of things in the South is a constant source of surprise to us.

Mr. Chairman, almost as good a showing as that which I have made for the cotton-grower can be made for the wheat-raiser of the Northwest, while the products of those engaged in these pursuits have never been enhanced one particle by protection.

But we are asked, Do not the farmers get what they have to buy cheaper than they formerly did? Our reply is, certainly they do: and if it is right that other people should receive all the benefits arising from the cheapening of products occasioned by the inventions of labor-saving machinery they have no right to complain; but the competitors of our farmers not only get their supplies for less than they formerly did, but as applied to those things which are subject to a protective tariff for less than our farmers can now obtain them, and certainly we ought not to longer continue a system which places at a disadvantage and renders harder the lot of those upon whom we all are ultimately dependent. As the price of the farmer's products is fixed in foreign markets we can not by legislation enhance it, but we can assist him to overcome competition there, by lessening the expense of production, and the only way we can do that is by reducing the cost of his supplies; but of this I desire to say more later on.

The doctrine of protection proceeds on the erroneous theory that every time people trade one party to the contract loses, when in fact the more they trade the richer they get if each receives from the other something he needs which it would have taken him longer to produce than it did to produce the article he parted with for it. When people are not hampered by restrictive legislation, and are permitted to trade where they can buy the cheapest, experience soon demonstrates where the various necessaries or luxuries of life can be produced with the least expenditure of labor, and they adapt themselves to the conditions prescribed by the laws of nature. Those I represent could, by some hot-house process, raise all the coffee they use, but since they can for less than one-tenth the cost raise other things which they can exchange for the coffee they consume, it would be foolish for them to do so.

It would be more absurd in detail, but not a particle different in principle, for our Government to attempt to coerce her citizens into growing their coffee than to try to force them to engage in any of the other unprofitable businesses. An industry which requires the assistance of protection is an unprofitable one, and if we take out of profitable employment a part of our citizens and put them at unprofitable work, those who remain in the profitable employment must support them. Hence it is that our agriculturists, being engaged in a business which is profitable, as theirs is, not on account of the large returns they receive, but on account of the economies they practice, are compelled not only to maintain their own business, but to contribute enough from their savings to render profitable the calling of others. Such an unjust and unnatural condition as this could not be productive of prosperity, and, unless my reasoning is very much at fault, it will be found that the growth of our country since we have had the protective system will not compare favorably with its development before we adopted it.

No periods could be found which would be more favorable for a fair comparison of the effects of the different tariff systems than the decades ending in 1860 and 1890. The low tariff of 1846 had time to be put into full operation at the beginning of the former and the high tariff had been in operation for years at the beginning of the latter. The economical conditions otherwise than as to the customs laws were very similar, as has been previously stated. I have already shown how under a low tariff our agriculture flourished, our manufactures prospered, our commerce extended, our wages advanced, and how the wealth of the country was somewhat evenly divided amongst those who created it. I have also shown how under a high tariff our agriculture faded, our manufactures languished, our commerce dwindled, our wages decreased, and how the wealth of the country became concentrated in the hands of the few.

I desire now to make a few final comparisons, but, before doing so, there is one other matter which ought to receive some consideration. As I have already stated, the wealth of the country increased during the decade ending in 1890 to the enormous amount of $20,000,000,000, and this fact is by some regarded as an evidence of the beneficial effects of protection, and we are asked why there was such an increase if the operation of a prohibitory tariff is as injurious as we contend that it is. Our reply is, that our resources are so bountiful and the energies of our people are so great that we have been prospering in spite of the difficulties under which we have labored. Our condition has been aptly likened to that of a spendthrift who has inherited a magnificent estate which yields an income larger than he can squander, and which continues to accumulate in spite of his extravagance. However, it is not the actual, but the relative increase which affords the proper basis of comparison to enable us to determine whether we have been augmenting our wealth more rapidly under the one system than the other.

Between 1850 and 1860 the aggregate wealth of the United States increased 126 per cent, while the population increased 35.58 per cent. Between 1880 and 1890, it increased 46 per cent, while the population increased 24.86 per cent. The value of the exports from the United States between 1850 and 1860, increased 130 per cent; between 1880 and 1890, 2½ per cent. This last statement seems almost incredible, and would, at least, raise a question as to whether there was not some unusual reason for so slight a gain in such an important item as that of our exports to foreign countries.

I, therefore, will extend the comparison. Between 1879 and 1889 the value of our exports increased 2.4 per cent, while between 1881 and 1891 it actually decreased 4.7 per cent. The value of the imports into this country increased from 1850 to 1860, 104 per cent; from 1880 to 1890, 18 per cent. In 1860 of the total imports into and the exports from the United States, 66.5 per cent was transported in our own vessels, while in 1880 only 17.4 per cent was, and in 1890 it decreased to 12.9 per cent, and in 1892 to 12.3 per cent, thus affording us abundant grounds for fearing that if our laws are not modified the American merchant marine, once the pride of every patriotic heart, will soon entirely disappear from the high seas.

But convincing as are these comparisons of the injurious results of the efforts of man to defy the laws of nature, they are not more so than was the condition in which our country was after a fair trial of the different tariff systems for a sufficient time to afford an opportunity for each to thoroughly demonstrate its effects. After fourteen years' experience under a strictly revenue tariff our people were fully and profitably employed, and the public countenance exhibited tranquillity, contentment, and happiness. It was this period which Gen. Garfield, in one of those speeches delivered in this House which so much added to his fame, described in this language:

> The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the decade from 1850 to 1860 was one of peace and general prosperity.

Senator MORRILL one of the ablest advocates of protection, in a speech delivered in 1867, describing the condition of our country in 1860, said:

> And that was a year of as large production and as much general prosperity as any perhaps in our history.

What a contrast does this picture present to the enforced idleness, misery, and suffering which we now see on every hand. But some say that the stagnation prevailing in all kinds of business in our country is caused by the apprehended change in our tariff schedules, and much complaint is heard of those who are attempting to lessen the burdens under which we have been laboring so long.

If it be true that our disturbances are occasioned or aggravated by threatened legislation, it would be as unreasonable to blame those who are trying to make needed changes in our customs laws as it would be to blame the surgeon who applies the probe, and to allow the assailant who inflicted the wound to go without censure.

But are our troubles due to the causes assigned by those who are trying to defeat the reforms for which the American people have so overwhelmingly pronounced? From their statements one would imagine that until within the last ten months we had been in the enjoyment of unbounded prosperity, when, as a matter of fact, our ills are merely the culmination of troubles begun long before there was any reasonable prospect of early tariff reform, and when, in truth, the possibility of that reform was hastened, if not occasioned, by the prevalence of the hardest times and most universal suffering which had been experienced for years.

The McKinley tariff bill, under which the already exorbitant customs tolls were greatly increased, became a law in 1890, and it so stimulated the home industries that their output greatly exceeded the capacity of our people to consume them. The inevitable result was that the factories closed down, strikes ensued, riots followed, and the party to whose legislation this deplorable state of affairs was properly attributed met with the most overwhelming rebuke which had been administered to any political organization within the memory of man. These occurrences are of such recent date that it is, perhaps, useless to substantiate the statement which I have just made; but I will submit some evidence to establish its correctness. The extracts which I will read are taken from reliable journals.

January 14, 1892:

The mills of the Oxford Nail and Iron Company, of Oxford, N. J., have been shut down for over two months. It is a mystery how the people live. In many houses there has not been a coal fire for weeks. If something is not done soon families are likely to starve to death.

February 14, 1892:

Owing to continued depression in the iron trade the Chesapeake Nail Works, and the puddling department of the Central Iron Works shut down to-night, throwing between 200 and 300 men out of employment.

March 17, 1893:

Twelve iron furnaces at Birmingham, Ala., reduced wages 10 per cent on Tuesday, because of the low price of iron. The men accepted the inevitable.

The Trade Review says:

The one thing in order is curtailment. There are signs, too, that the work has begun. Five Valley furnaces will quit within a week we are assured. That all that has been said within these past three months of the desperately unwholesome condition of the market was founded on fact appears on the one hand by the wholesale discharge of employés and the shutting down of puddling mills, and on the other hand by the bad failure of a prominent Valley iron firm, which there can be but little doubt will be followed by the blowing out of more than one stack.

April 13, 1893:

The Quaker Oatmeal Mills of Ravenna, Ohio, employing 150 men, have shut down indefinitely. This is part of the plan of the American Cereal Company, "The oat-meal trust," to limit production and force prices up, in order that some returns can be earned on its capital.

May 12, 1892:

The Iron Age reported that the manufacturers of the Mahoning and Shenango Valleys have agreed upon a scale of wages which they will present to the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers in June, and that "it is understood that a thorough rearrangement of prices has been made and that quite a material reduction in the price of puddling has been demanded."

June 5, 1892:

At a mass meeting of the Cloth Hat and Cap Makers' Union in New York on to-day over 700 men, representing 26 out of the 30 shops in the city, discussed the grievance of wage reduction. It was said that during the last year several reductions in their wages at different times had made a total reduction of 70 per cent, and that during the best four months of the year the best men have been unable to earn more than $6 a week. They will make an effort to get wages back above starvation point. Pitiable as is the lot of these men it is no worse than that of hat-makers elsewhere in this country since the McKinley bill came their way. A few years ago the hat factories of Bloomfield, Watsessung, and East Orange, N. J., were prosperous and gave steady employment to hundreds of hands. The almost prohibitive duty on hatters' raw materials has caused the business to dwindle until now no mill in Bloomfield is running on full time and many of the employés have sought work in other business.

Similar evidence of the evil effects of the increased duties imposed by the act of 1890 could be added indefinitely, but these will suffice to show the falsity of the claim that our business paralysis has come upon us since there has been a prospect of a speedy tariff reform, and much less has it been caused by it.

What, then, has been the cause of the depression which has become so severe, so universal, and so long-continued? The explanation is to me perfectly clear. Everybody in this country is dependent, directly or indirectly, upon the agriculturists. If, therefore, the farmers are prosperous others will be. If they are not, none can be.

I have already shown how, under the operation of the high tariff, a portion of the earnings of the farmers, which ought to have remained their property, has been for years diverted from them and donated to others. As prior to the adoption of the protective system the property of the country was somewhat evenly divided, the farmers had about their just proportion of it. But gradually, though surely, their possessions were drawn from them; since after paying protection prices for what they had to buy while realizing only free-trade prices for what they had to sell, they could not, even with the strictest economy, earn enough to supply themselves and their families with the comforts and conveniences which modern civilization demands, their original capital became impaired. To make good their losses they were compelled to borrow. The Census Department has compiled the figures showing the amount of the mortgage debt on real estate, outside of the cities and towns, in all the States and Territories, except Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Washington, and the result is startling.

In 1891 it was $537,236,947, an increase since 1880 of 57.58 per cent. In some of the agricultural States the per cent of increase largely exceeded the average. In Alabama it was 270 per cent; in Georgia, 218 per cent; in Florida, 533 per cent; in Tennessee, 197 per cent; in Mississippi, 143 per cent; in Arkansas, 150 per cent; in Missouri, 106 per cent; in Nebraska, 234 per cent. It is claimed that the money borrowed has been devoted to the improvement of the farms, and that is doubtless so to a considerable extent in the new States, though it can not be the case with those east of the Mississippi River.

But there is a limit to all things. The money-lenders realized that they had advanced all they could with safety on the farmers' property, and this source of obtaining ready money was cut off. Our farmers, therefore, being unable to buy the merchants' goods the merchants had no occasion to purchase from the manufacturers, and our manufacturers being restricted to the home markets were compelled to close their establishments and deprive of work thousands of their employés. This, happening as it did at a time when values had been unduly inflated by wild speculations conducted to a great extent on borrowed capital, caused the collapse which has resulted in so much suffering, misery, and loss.

It remains now to discuss the means by which we can check the adverse tide, which seems to be about to engulf our country in wreck and ruin.

The remedy proposed by the advocates of protection, represented on this floor by the Republicans, is to allow the existing tariff laws to remain unaltered. Unless everything that I have said is utterly fallacious, this suggestion should not be dignified with controversy. It is as if the physician whose patient had impaired his health and undermined his constitution by the continued use of alcohol should prescribe more excessive libations of the same fluid as an antidote for that which had caused his troubles.

The remedy proposed by the advocates of inflation, represented on this floor by the Populists, is to, in some manner, make money more plentiful. Though the methods by which they have heretofore proposed to do this do not commend themselves to my judgment and will encounter my earnest opposition, still with the results they will seek to accomplish, if they should ever make an effort to expand our circulating medium, I will be in full sympathy, and I am not only willing but anxious to vote for any measure looking to an increase in the volume of our currency to the very uttermost limit to which that can be done without impairing its absolute and immediate convertibility into the coin of the country.

But while I believe that it would be to our interest to have the very largest possible circulation, provided it is safe and sound, still I do not agree with those who contend that an insufficient quantity of money contributed to any material extent to our present troubles. It must not be forgotten that we have had a much larger circulation, aggregate and per capita, each year for the past ten years, while the vast body of our people have been growing poorer and poorer, than we had at any time when they were growing richer and richer. Nor should it be forgotten that our circulation has been increasing every year during the past fifteen years, and that as our circulation grew larger the times grew harder. In 1878 the money in the United States in circulation, that is, outside of the Treasury, was $15.32 per capita. In 1890, when the acute stage of present troubles struck us, it had grown to $22.82, in 1891 to $23.41, in 1892 to $24.44, and in 1893 to $25.57.

Just at this time, when there is almost a complete stagnation in all kinds of business enterprises, the banks all over the land have the largest balances of cash on hand which has ever been known. Money can be had in the financial centers at as low a rate of interest as any reasonable man could desire. Business has not been paralyzed because money can not be had at reasonable rates of interest, but money can not be loaned at reasonable rates of interest because business has been paralyzed. The cure for this state of affairs must be found not so much in increasing our circulating medium as in adopting some policy which will permit a more extensive and just circulation of the medium we already have.

Another thing which must not be overlooked is that the price of our agricultural products, as I have shown, is fixed in foreign markets. How, then, could the fact that we have a larger volume of money affect the price of our cotton, our wheat, or our corn when we can not increase the volume of the money of the country where their prices are fixed.

But, after all, if we had a per capita circulation of $50, the causes which have drained practically all of the capital of the country into one section of it and concentrated it in the hands of a comparatively few people would affect the increased circulation in the same way.

The remedy proposed by the advocates of tariff reform, represented on this floor by the Democrats, is to abandon the system under the operation of which we have been brought to the verge of ruin and to return to the one under which all will be "free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement," and which "will not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned," and to restore the prosperity of all by permitting the prosperity of those upon whom all are dependent.

A bill by which we seek to accomplish this result has been framed by the committee having the matter in charge, and is now the subject of consideration. It is one which, with the exception of a single item, meets with my unqualified approval. I can not agree that because the policy of paying a bounty to one class of our citizens (the sugar-growers) was inaugurated by another party, we should undo that wrong gradually. I am in favor of an immediate repeal of the law which provides that a part of the taxes which have been collected from all our people should be donated to a few of them. Otherwise I regard the measure under discussion as one which, in view of the depleted condition of our Treasury, is as nearly up to the ideal tariff reform bill as could be reasonably hoped for.

If the changes proposed should be accomplished the present duties on imported goods, which are equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 49.58 per cent, will be reduced to 30.66 per cent. If this reduction applied in equal proportions to all imports it would neither satisfy the just demands of our people nor be consistent with our platform declaration, that "the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purpose of revenue only."

But, as I have shown, the tariff on many articles is already on a revenue basis, and accordingly we find that, as to those things, there has been but little and in some cases no reduction, while as to a few there has been an increase. For instance, the revenue derived from the duty on champagnes and wines imported in 1892 amounted to $5,058,661.71, and it is not proposed to change the rates on these articles. The revenue paid on imported silks for 1892 was $16,965,637.03, and it is only proposed to reduce the tariff charges on silks from 53.56 per cent to 45.13 per cent. On the imports of tobacco the revenues collected was $10,265,067.98, and it is only proposed to reduce the duty from 117.82 per cent to 91.58 per cent. The duty on diamonds and pearls, which has heretofore been 10 per cent, it is proposed to increase to 15 per cent.

In contrast to these, I will state the present and proposed rates on a few of the articles on which the duty is now prohibitory. On wool hats the present duty ranges from 86 to 106 per cent; the proposed duty from 25 to 35 per cent. On flannels the present duty from 84 to 103 per cent; the proposed duty from 25 to 40 per cent. On blankets, present duty from 80 to 103 per cent; proposed duty from 25 to 35 per cent. On shawls, present duty from 88 to 150 per cent; proposed duty 40 per cent.

The average duty on metals and the manufactures thereof, under the present law, is 58.91 per cent, under the proposed law it would be 35.50 per cent. In this, as in other lines, the reductions which it is proposed to make do not apply to everything in equal proportions, but is greatest on such articles as we are compelled to use. It is not proposed to make any change in the duty of 35 per cent now imposed on swords, sword blades, and side arms; while cotton ties, now subject to a duty of from 40.03 to 50.23 per cent, are to be placed on the free list.

No change is recommended in the duty of 25 per cent now imposed on watches; but on screws it is proposed to reduce the present rate, which runs from 46 to 110 per cent, to 30 per cent. The duty on dice, chessmen, and billiard balls is to remain 50 per cent, as at present. Salt, now subject to a duty of from 35.14 to 82.33 per cent, is to be put on the free list. The duty on firecrackers, gunpowder, and percussion caps, which now ranges from 25.81 per cent to 147.32 per cent, is to remain as at present; coal, now subject to a duty ranging from 22.72 to 28.68 per cent, is to be admitted free. No reduction is proposed in the present tariff charges of 20 per cent on furs; lumber, now subject to a duty ranging from 8.33 per cent to 21.40 per cent, is to be placed on the free list. The tariff of 25 per cent on the manufactures of amber, asbestus, coral, and jet is to remain as at present; but iron, which is now subject to a tariff ranging from 15 to 42.70 per cent, is to be admitted free.

So, it will be seen that while the reductions of the duties on necessaries is very considerable, the average is not very great, because the reductions on luxuries is so small.

What changes will place the tariff on a revenue basis as to an article on which the duty has heretofore been prohibitory can only be determined by experiment. If, after the lapse of sufficient time to test the matter, it is ascertained that on some things the rate is still prohibitory, further reductions can be and doubtless will be made.

Representing, as I do, a constituency which is as essentially agricultural perhaps as any represented on this floor, I can not forbear to express my gratification at the consideration the committee which framed the bill under discussion has accorded to that most important of all industries.

Each change recommended by the committee will, if adopted, lessen the disadvantages under which our farmers have labored, and will enable them to retain a larger portion of the wealth they create. While they will still be compelled to have the price of their products fixed on a free-trade basis, they will be able to obtain much of what they buy at free-trade prices.

This is particularly the case with the cotton-planter. If the recommendations of the committee are adopted, he can obtain, without having their cost enhanced by a tariff on them; the lumber with which he builds his houses, his barns, and his fences; the oil with which he lights and the fuels with which he heats his dwelling; the salt with which he seasons his food and preserves his meats, the medicines with which he heals his sick, the implements with which he cultivates his crop, the machinery with which he renders his cotton available for market, the ties with which he prepares it for shipment, and when exported the bagging with which he protects it. He can obtain the benefit of the lower prices which will result from the competition between the home and foreign producers of the hardware he uses; of the clothes, the hats, and the shoes he wears, and of everything else he consumes.

It is not strange that one who has been the recipient, as I have, of continued favors from a constituency whose chief industry is the production of cotton, should hail with delight the prospects of the adoption of a policy which will lessen the burdens and render more prosperous the condition of those who have contributed so much to the prosperity of, but who have received such little consideration from their Government as have the cotton-growers.

For this policy the American freemen have declared in no uncertain tones. But the battle is not yet won. Self-confident from continued triumphs and the possession of unlimited capital, tenacious of old theories and honestly fearing the result of any change, the beneficiaries of protection will contest every inch, and, like the old guard, will to a man die in the last ditch.

With unfaltering faith the Democracy of the nation, never elated in victory, never daunted in defeat, marches to the performance of her mission, and will renew charge after charge until she solves the people's problems and rights the people's wrongs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, in some remarks made in the Fifty-second Congress when a bill similar to this was pending, which was intended to give some manufacturers a bonus at the expense of the wool-grower, I said:

> I have sometimes thought that if the people of these United States would highly resolve to hang by the neck until he was dead the first citizen, and every other citizen or alien, whether in Congress or out of Congress, who proposed, within the next twenty years, any change whatever in the tariff laws of the United States, it would conduce more to the permanent prosperity of the country than any resolution ever made and enforced by the American people. [Laughter.]
> What this country wants, and must have, for its permanent prosperity, is certainty and stability of its laws; not continual change and uncertainty.

I said then "I sometimes thought so;" I say now I think so all the time; for the very threat of such change, coupled with the power the Democratic party now has to put the threat into execution, has produced widespread disaster throughout the land.

We were told three or four months ago that the so-called Sherman law caused all the trouble and distress that then covered the land, and the President called the Congress together to remove that cause by repealing that law. It was done. The law was repealed, but it is now seen that it had no more power to allay the public distress than would the casting of a pebble to still the mighty waves of the Atlantic. It is now patent to everyone what a wicked fraud this hue and cry set on the Sherman law was. What a clumsy and futile attempt to divert attention from the real cause of the distress that then hovered over all our country and rests on it to-day, which was the attack of the Democratic President and his managers upon the business interests and welfare of the American people for the benefit of all Europe.

It is unfortunate for all the people that the exigencies of the Democratic party seem to require it always to attack the business interests of the country, and every industry in it, except those clustered around Wall street, and of the foreigners doing business within its shadows; but it is a party that is only democratic in name. It is in fact the close ally and servant of aristocracy; witness its attempt to overthrow a republic and set up a monarchy; the attorney for foreign money-lenders and domestic stock gamblers and corporations.

This bill is nothing more and nothing less than the ordinary tariff tinkers' bill, which has made its appearance often in Congress for years past; but owing to the fact that a Republican Senate or a Republican President has heretofore stood between the people and the threatened harm, no injury had been done.

The pending proposition is entitled "A bill to reduce taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes." But this title does not express the true purpose of the bill. To do that it must be amended so as to read, "A bill for the relief of the Democratic party, at the expense of the producers and laboring people of the United States, and to reduce the revenue."

The authors of the bill confess that it will reduce the revenue $70,000,000, and there is no doubt that it will accomplish its purposes most effectively, and also in a different direction from that intended. It will relieve that party from all responsibility for legislation for twenty years, beginning March 4, 1895, and will soon after relieve it of the cares of government in every department.

It is true that a majority of the people of the United States voted for the policy set out in the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago by voting for the candidates standing upon it. There was no uncertainty about the tariff plank in that platform. It was plain and concise, admitting of but one meaning. Of course it may be charged that not being double-faced it could not be a genuine Democratic plank. However that may be, they put it in their platform and every Democratic candidate stood upon it. The people of this country can not claim to have been deceived by the tariff plank.

The Democratic party claimed that the policy of "protection was a fraud," a "robbery," and, besides that, was unconstitutional. It said to all the raisin-growers of the twelve counties of the Seventh California district—for in every county of that district the production of raisins is a leading industry—"The tariff that gives you a protection of 2½ cents per pound on raisins, that compels the raisin-growers of Spain to pay 2½ cents per pound toll, to come into your markets and compete with you, is a fraud and a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few, and besides is unconstitutional. We will reform that tariff, take that protection you now enjoy away."

They said to nearly all the producers in the country—not to all, for they had some pets—the same to nearly all operatives in the factories throughout the land—not to all of them—that "the protection given you by the tariff to the articles you are manufacturing, thereby enabling you to receive greater wages than you otherwise would, is a fraud, a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few, and is unconstitutional."

Mr. Chairman, theories are beautiful things sometimes; facts are very obstinate things. I have a few facts to present. Here are some raisins for which the other day I paid here in Washington at retail 15 cents a pound; here are some purchased at another store, for which I paid 25 cents a pound; here are some for which I paid at another store 30 cents a pound. All these raisins are from Fresno County, Cal., in my district. All of them are of the same grade. These raisins, the retail price of which was at different stores 15 cents, 25 cents, and 30 cents, are, as I have said, of the same grade, a grade of which Fresno County alone has sent out this year over 2,000 car loads. For those raisins the producers receive from 3½ cents to 4 cents a pound, free on board the cars.

Now, I want to ask any really smart gentleman (I do not want anybody else to attempt to reply) whether he supposes that if this tariff bill, taking 1 cent off the duty on raisins should go into effect, the man on F street here who charges me 40 cents a pound for imported raisins will the next day after the bill is passed cut the price down to 39 cents; or that the man from whom I bought this other specimen of imported raisins for 35 cents a pound of the same brand (his store being on the avenue and not quite as stylish as the one on F street, where I bought those for 40 cents), will put the price down to 34 cents a pound. You all know better than to suppose such a thing. You know how stupid and ridiculous it is to make an argument that this reduction of the duty on raisins will in any case inure to the extent of 1 penny to the benefit of any consumer in the United States. Every man of common sense knows that such will not be the effect. [Applause.] You simply lose that much money from your Treasury.

Then you propose in this bill to reduce the duty on oranges. The duty now on oranges is 10 cents per cubic foot, which you propose to reduce to 8 cents. Now with first-class large oranges there will be about forty in a cubic foot—from forty to fifty. The reduction of duty proposed in this bill on a dozen oranges, sold at retail in the city of Washington to-day at 75 cents a dozen, would be about one-half of a cent. Do you suppose that if you reduce the tariff in this way the man who is now charging 75 cents a dozen for those oranges will, after you have adopted this Democratic tariff, reduce the price to 74½ cents? You know he will not. That is your argument. You know as well as I do that it does not affect the customer at all, and all your bill is to benefit the importer, the handler, the dealer, and nowhere in this bill is the interest and welfare of the consumer benefited.

Your Democratic argument—one of your strongest arguments—has circled around the dinner pail of the workingman. I bought one to-day and weighed it. It weighed 4 ounces, and cost 10 cents. You propose to reduce the tariff about 1 cent a pound on tin. That would reduce the price of the workingman's pail in accordance with your idea, if it be a correct one, exactly one-fourth of a cent. Allowing the workingman four pails a year, you would take off the burden of taxation each year to the amount of a whole red cent from that workingman. [Laughter and applause.]

But while making this tremendous saving in the way of taxation laid upon him, you have taken $150 from him of his wages for that year; and then you can boast that you have reduced the price of his dinner pail a quarter of a cent!

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORSE. I want to suggest to my friend that I fear the workingman is more concerned now about something to put into the pail than what he has to pay for it.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is the lamentable fact. I have here a letter from an old friend in Wisconsin, one of the proprietors of a large manufactory. It is as follows:

FORT ATKINSON, WIS., December 22, 1892.

DEAR SIR: What I want is a copy of the Wilson tariff bill, if you can send it to me, and I would also like the minority report. I am taking quite an interest in this tariff matter because it affects us somewhat. While the tariff on tin is to be reduced, it seems as though it would be to our advantage; but dealers in Chicago tell us that tin would be no cheaper under the new tariff law, as manufacturers in England have told them this summer that if it was reduced they should advance the price on tin, and I believe that the dealers and brokers in tin in Chicago firmly believe this to be so.

I am in hopes that our tin industry has got such a start that it will be able to hold its own, even now, but of this I am a little doubtful. Had it continued two years longer we should have been able to obtain all the tin wanted in America, made by American manufacturers.

Yours respectfully,

D. W. CURTIS.

Hon. W. W. BOWERS,
193 Fourth street, SE., Washington, D. C.

The gentleman from Texas who preceded me told us about the resources of the cotton States, and how cotton-growers went to work like men without any aid or any tariff for protection and raised so much cotton. But he did not tell why the rice-growers in the Carolinas did not wade into their work like men without asking a cent and a half a pound protection? Why do you give it to them? Did they ask for it, or is it a fact that you have some friends, some pets, in the rice business, who own some rice plantations? [Laughter.]

The people of six of the nine counties then comprising the Seventh California district accepted the Democratic platform and went Democratic by a good majority, and when the returns came in showing that the Democratic platform had won, they celebrated the victory in grand style, got up big processions, held large ratification meetings, shouted themselves hoarse, and fell on each others' necks in an ecstacy of joy. As it was in California, so everywhere, the victory of reform was celebrated, and if any man was happier than a Democrat in those days, it was the festive Mugwump, who was once a Republican, but failing to get a nomination for some office, let the canker of disappointed ambition prey upon him until the very blood in his veins ran sour, and he became a natural-born Mugwump; and by the way, specimens of this kind of homo were greatly prized and admired by our Democratic friends; they laid the best offices they had at their feet and Democrats became their servants.

I am speaking of the conditions that existed one year ago. There have been some changes since then, some very great changes, even among Democrats, although I may say, parenthetically, that the condition I have described of Democratic admiration for, and subserviency to, Mugwumps seems to remain the same in the higher circles of Democracy, as shown by recent events.

But now in California those people who were so enthusiastic for reform are again holding meetings, not to ratify reform over again. Oh, no; very serious business meetings have taken the place of political meetings. These people are not quite as delirious as they were. The low diet prescribed for them by the Democratic reform doctors has cooled their fevered blood. Somehow the great reform victory has not panned out the blessings it promised in the blossom; they find its fruit—like the apples of Sodom, fair to the eye—turn to ashes in their mouths, and even the pretty little roosters they carried on their hats so proudly have turned into poor little scrawny black crows.

Hardly had the echoes of the anvils which were fired at the cross-roads ratification, or of the cannon fired in the towns in celebration of the great reform victory died away before the people began to realize that a change was taking place. They felt a chill in the air. For more than twenty years they had basked in the sunshine of American prosperity, and during all these years the ring of the hammer on the anvil, the whir of the mill-wheel, the sounding blows from the forges, the throbbing of all the mighty machinery everywhere, all blending together in the grand anthem of industry, had rung in their ears, and they had kept time with its step and melody, and every breeze carried the swelling notes of the chorus of the worker's song.

But now fainter and fainter came the melody; farther and farther away it seemed; note after note dropped out of the song, and in their stead there came the discordant cry of dismay, the wail of distress, the sounds of the mourning for murdered opportunities and industries. They saw the fires die in the furnaces, the wheels of the mill fall asleep, the miner's pick growing rusty, and the sounds from the forge had died away. They saw the black clouds of Democracy drifting across the sky, and prosperity fly away. They saw that Democracy and prosperity could not dwell together; that they were opposites, incompatible, unassimilable, and must forever remain strangers to each other.

Forced to see and feel all this, these people now say to you, "We have deceived ourselves; we have been punished enough for our folly; give us back the prosperity and the peace and the comfort we enjoyed under protection, for one day of the glorious sun of Republican prosperity is worth a thousand years of such as this one given us by the Democracy. Take away your tariff reform, take it back to the devil who invented it and who owns it; we want no more of it." So say the farmers, so say the producers, so say all the workers in the field and shop who have made this country what it is.

Who asks for the passage of this bill? Is it the farmer? No. The miner? No. The wool-grower? No. The manufacturer? No. The workman in the factories? No. Any American industry? No. All of these protest against it; from every section of the country, from Maine to Texas, from Florida to Washington, the protests come thick and fast.

Mr. PICKLER. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BELL] says that they are "coerced."

Mr. BOWERS of California. Coerced! Well there will be some other gentlemen coerced about the next time the people get a chance to talk to them at the polls. [Laughter and applause.]

This bill comes in here followed by the imprecations of the American people, and in his secret heart many a member who will be forced to vote for it curses the fate that compels him, and will hereafter. Pushed in here by Democratic politicians at the demand of importers and foreigners, denounced by every industry in the United States, who is left asking for it? England, France, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Canada; all these are asking for it. It is in fact "all Europe against America," and in this contest we see the Democratic President and his managers espousing the interests of Europe as against their own people. Who else demands this legislation? The newspapers owned by foreign importers. Who else? The bond dealers. Who else? The capitalists. Who else? The corporations. Who else? The man who would rather give employment to an English or a French manufactory than to an American industry; to a vineyardist in France or Spain than to one in the United States. Who else? The man who would rather see thousands and tens of thousands of American citizens walking the streets asking for work and bread, as they do to-day under this Democratic Administration, than employed in the mills and mines and on the farms as they were under the American policy of the Republican party. Who else? No one. Have I overdrawn the picture in this statement?

Mr. SIMPSON. I think you have.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will cite the best Democratic authority, and call the President of the United States as a witness, that I have not. Will you accept his evidence?

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not know that I will.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Here is what he says to you. Here is the extraordinary confession he makes in his message to this Congress:

> In my great desire for the success of this measure I can not resist the suggestion that its success can only be attained by means of unselfish counsel on the part of the friends of tariff reform, and as a result of their willingness to subordinate personal desires and ambition to the general good. The local interests affected by the proposed tariff are so numerous and so varied that if all insisted upon them, legislation embodying the reform must inevitably fail.—Cleveland's Message.

Can there be a better reason given than the one he has here given you for the defeat of this bill? He tells this Congress plainly that if it consults the interests of the people of the United States, then this tariff cake becomes dough on both sides. This reform must fail if the local interests of the people are consulted. Well, a reform that is antagonistic and harmful to the local interests of our people ought to fail, and will fail sooner or later. All interests are local; what is termed the general interest is but the sum of the local interests, and there is not a local interest but this bill touches. Not a change it proposes to make from existing law that will not be detrimental to the true interests of our people and advantageous to the interests of the people of Europe, and there is hardly a township in the United States, inhabited by a white person, that this malign bill does not threaten with harm.

The motto of the Republican party always has been, and is now, "American opportunities and American markets belong to American citizens who have made them."

The motto of the Democratic party to-day is: "American opportunities and American markets belong to the world. No discrimination in favor of American citizens as against foreigners."

I read from the Pall Mall Gazette, one of the leading journals of England:

> LONDON, November 9, 1892.
> The Pall Mall Gazette this afternoon says that "both the merchants and the unemployed workingmen of England have reason to rejoice at the Democratic victory, as with the possibility of the reopening of the American market to the goods of Birmingham, Bradford, and Manchester, capitalists will get a chance to procure some return on their money invested, and the workingmen will have an opportunity to get a decent price for their labor without the necessity of striking."

And every English journal said substantially the same. England is unanimous for the passage of this bill; so is France, and Germany, and Spain, and Italy, and Canada. It has no opposition anywhere in the world except from the great mass of the people of the United States.

One more citation from an English newspaper, the Warehouseman and Draper. It says:

> Speaking at Sheffield at the banquet in honor of the anniversary of American independence, Mr. Folsom, the United States consul in that town, who is now on the point of retiring, expressed the satisfaction that he felt in the belief that "before another twelve months have rolled by Sheffield will not be subjected to the onerous and oppressive duties of the United States which have so restricted her trade."

For years the Democratic politicians have rung the changes on Republican extravagance and corruption. They have sought to impress upon the people the idea that they were being robbed by the protective tariff; that our workmen were being oppressed and the country going to the dogs, and a lot more of such rubbish. It is true that comparisons are odious, but as the Democratic politicians invite them they should have them. Let us contrast the condition of this country as it was under Republican rule, as it is under Democratic rule. I will hold up the picture of the Republican rule as painted by some first-class Democratic artists. We will not go back far, only to last year.

On the 17th of July, 1892, the New York Herald (Democratic) remarked:

> The business of the country is in a provokingly healthy condition. * * * New industrial enterprises for manufacturing iron, cotton, and woolen fabrics are going into operation in various sections. * * * In the face of such a condition of things the calamity howler must remain silent.

On July 15, 1892, the Boston Herald, a pronounced advocate of Cleveland and free trade, asked:

> Where is the idle woolen mill to-day? There is none. * * * Not only are the great majority of the woolen mills employed, but many * * * are contemplating enlargements and improvements, or such enlargements and improvements are already begun. What does all this mean? It means simply the greatest consumption of wool the country has known for many years.

On the 10th of September, 1892, the Dry Goods Economist, also tarred with the free-trade brush, was constrained to remark that—

> Dress goods manufacturers ought to be happy this season because they are busy delivering the goods already ordered and booking orders for more. * * * They can confidently look forward to a continuous run of business for the next six months.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Report, a colorless trade paper, in July, 1892, said:

> A fiscal year never matched in the history of the country in volume of industrial productions, in magnitude of domestic exchanges, or in foreign trade has just closed.

That eminent free-trader Edward Atkinson, whose knowledge of economics compares with that of Mr. Cleveland as an encyclopedia compares with a primer, says, speaking of the country under Republican rule:

> There has never been a period in the history of this or any other country when the general rate of wages was as high as it is now, or the price of goods relatively to the wages as low as they are to-day, nor a period when the workman, in the strict sense of the word, has so fully secured to his own use and enjoyment such a steadily and progressively increasing proportion of a constantly increasing product.

The honorable member from New York, Mr. COCKRAN, taking as his authority the Aldrich report, which, he said, emanated from a Democratic Bureau of Statistics, and the accuracy of whose figures had never been disputed, showed that "never before in the history of human civilization have wages been so high, measured by gold." And that "by the figures of this Aldrich commit ee we find that labor enjoys to-day the largest proportion of that which it produces that it has ever enjoyed in the history of the world." As the Aldrich report was made March 3, 1893, one day before the Democratic party came into power, and most of its figures only include the year 1891, this is valuable testimony to the prosperity of the country under Republican rule.

This is the picture painted by Democrats and free traders of the prosperous condition of this country up to the time it was ascertained that the Democrats had come into power in all the Departments of the Federal Government. Never before did this nation or any other that ever existed on earth make such progress and enjoy such a degree of prosperity as the United States during the twenty-five years of Republican rule preceding the 5th day of November, 1892. Never before anywhere, in any land, did the common people receive so large a recompense for their labor or enjoy to so great an extent the luxuries as well as the comforts of life, as did all the people of the United States during that period.

Shall I draw the picture of the condition of the country under Democratic rule as it is to-day? I hardly deem it necessary. It is too familiar to all of us. You see it everywhere; every morning it stares at you from your newspaper, the pictures of closed mills, of dead industries, of enforced idleness and destitution in places where heretofore work and wages, comfort and contentment, held the reins and kept even pace with the passing days. Never before in the history of the nation did such widespread, and universal commercial and financial disaster come upon it as came with the accession of the Democratic party to power. It would seem that disaster and Democracy were twins, bound by a common tie which, if severed, leads to the death of both.

This bill is a fraud; a proposition to rob the many for the benefit of the few. It is so characterized by the assembled wisdom of the Democratic party the last time it pulled itself together at Chicago. I will read from the gospel according to Democracy, its last testament, chapter 3:

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud and a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few; * * * the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only.

And yet in the face of this declaration the chiefs of that party bring in here this unconstitutional bill, without a doubt the worst specimen of a protective tariff bill ever introduced in Congress, containing the most outrageous discrimination against the many for the benefit of the few, against the farmer and the producer and in favor of the toll-taker. Do the farmers and the producers of this country constitute the few and the manufacturers the many? [Applause.]

This extraordinary specimen of a protective tariff bill says to all the wool-growers of this country, "The Republican policy which protects your product by a tariff of from 25 to 40 per cent is a fraud and a robbery of the many (big mill-owners) for the benefit of the few (sheep-herders). It shall cease. You must take your places by the side of and on a level with the bushmen of Australia and New Zealand, and compete with them if you will persist in such low-down business as wool-growing." At the same time it pats lovingly on the back the big mill-owner who manufactures that wool, and says to him, "You are my hearty; your product shall have 40 per cent protection; you shall not be forced to compete with the cheap goods of Europe. Those foreign manufacturers shall pay you half their goods are worth before they shall come into the American market and compete with you. We will take care of you; but we've no use for that sheep-herder, doncher know."

What a beautiful sample of Democratic revenue reform this thing is. Was there ever a more shameless discrimination attempted?

I read a few days ago in a newspaper a large number of New Year's sentiments, contributed, the paper said, by many of the greatest men in the world; among them I read the following sentiment:

Powerful as our Government is, it never had or can have authority to tax one man to make another's vocation pay.

This sentiment was signed by one of the distinguished members of this House from Tennessee. I have read many times that the tariff was a tax, and this our Democratic friends to the last man stoutly maintain. They denounce the McKinley tariff law, charging that it does exactly the thing that the honorable gentleman from Tennessee declared this Government had no authority to do; and yet, wherein does this bill, which I presume the honorable gentleman will support and vote for, differ from the McKinley act? In two respects only; both are essentially and entirely protective tariff bills, different first in this: The McKinley act was intended to raise an adequate revenue for the support of the Government by increasing the tax on foreign goods, in the form of a tariff, and thus decreasing the tax upon our own people and our own products.

This bill proposes the exact reverse—to reduce the revenue by reducing the tax on foreign goods and thus creating a necessity for increasing the tax on our own people and our own products. Second. The McKinley act sought as far as possible to do equal justice; to give all an equal share of protection. It gave the wool-grower the same protection it did the wool-handler, the manufacturer. This bill makes the most abominable and shameless discrimination as to the persons, industries, and localities it seeks to protect, and every line in this bill fixing a tariff rate is drawn for the protection of some article, some industry, some class, and not "for revenue only."

Upon what theory of a tariff for revenue only can paragraph 193, page 29, be defended, which fixes the duty on barley 20 per cent ad valorem and barley malt 30 per cent ad valorem? Upon none. It was to protect the maltster, and to give him 33⅓ per cent more protection than was given the barley-grower, and the change was made from 25 per cent, as it was in the original draft of the bill, to 30 per cent, upon the representation to the committee that the maltster needed that amount of duty for the protection of his industry.

Upon what theory of a tariff for revenue only is the duty upon rice made specific—1¼ cents per pound—while other grains have ad valorem duties upon them. Why ad valorem duties on barley and specific duties on rice? Upon what theory of a tariff for revenue only can the sliding scale of bounties to be paid the sugar producer be defended? None. It is protection. Nothing else; and if there is anything in our system of taxation that taxes one man to make another's vocation pay it is this sugar schedule. It is an impossibility for a tariff for revenue only to have a sliding scale of ad valorem duties, or both ad valorem and specific duties, or a free list; because any and every variation in a rate of duty or exemption from duty is for protection; must be. Neither the Democratic party nor any other party ever introduced a general tariff bill for revenue only, which, of course, must tax all imports alike. No party dare to do so stupid a thing. All these bills are for protection and revenue the same as this one, only this is the most unjust, illogical proposition of the kind ever made.

See paragraphs 101 and 102, page 15, marble, rough in block or squared, 40 cents per cubic foot; but sawed, dressed, or otherwise manufactured, 75 cents per cubic foot.

In tariff for revenue only, why should there be different ad valorem rates of duty on marble?

The Oakland Times, one of the leading Democratic papers of California, said editorially a few days ago:

This Congress was elected to reform the tariff. The complexion of the Senate was changed to facilitate the work. Benjamin Harrison was displaced from the Presidency to make room for Grover Cleveland in order that tariff duties could be reduced to a revenue basis.

"A tariff for revenue" in contradistinction to a tariff for protection was the issue of the last Presidential election. It was debated on the stump in every State and discussed in every newspaper and periodical in the land. Party platforms clearly defined the issue, and parties accepted the gauge of battle on the lines thus laid down. The issue was not dodged, nor was it, as in many cases, so connected and cumbered with other issues that it did not stand alone and sharply defined.

The Times states the exact facts as to this issue. The Democratic party was pledged to "a tariff for revenue only" and against protection. The Republican party was squarely pledged to protection.

In view of all these indisputable facts, the following letter, written by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and whose name is given to this bill, becomes very interesting reading:

INTERESTS OF MANUFACTURERS—CHAIRMAN WILSON POINTS OUT THAT HE HAS A TENDER CONSIDERATION FOR THEM.

BOSTON, January 2.

The American Wool and Cotton Reporter will to-morrow publish the following letter from Chairman WILSON, of the Ways and Means Committee:

"In your issue of December 28 I find in a letter from Mr. James McLaughlin, jr., Glenside Woolen Mills, the following statement:

"'The writer has just returned from Washington, after having a conference with Mr. WILSON and the Hon. DAVID B. HILL, and both of these men expressed themselves as having no interest in the mill-owners, but if it can be shown that it will affect the voters' interest they are ready to consider a change in the tariff bill,' etc.

"Permit me to state that so far as I am referred to this statement is absolutely incorrect. I never expressed any such statement and never entertained any such idea. I do not recall any conversation with the writer, but that may be due to my inability to remember all with whom I have recently talked. I do believe, and have said to gentlemen thus interviewing me, that the interests of 70,000,000 men, women, and children, who consume woolen goods, should have paramount consideration; but the fact that I have reported a bill carrying 40 per cent protection to mill-owners—$4 on $10 worth of goods—shows a very tender consideration for the interests of the mill-owners, especially in view of the fact that in 1866 the joint report of the wool manufacturers and wool-growers only asked that 'all manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool or worsted shall be subjected to a duty which shall be equal to 25 per cent net.' This is only one of numberless misrepresentations I have undertaken to correct.

Now, if there is any one man more competent to speak of this bill, what it means to do, what it is, it must be the gentleman whose name it bears, and is in large part the architect and superintendent of it, and he here unequivocally declares that the bill he has reported "carries 40 per cent protection to mill-owners, $4 on $10 worth of goods." So I have the testimony of the chairman of the committee that I have characterized this bill aright; it is for protection, and is in no respect consonant with the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago, and no Democrat who is honestly in favor of that platform and its tariff plank can consistently vote for it, and no Democrat can redeem his pledge to support "a tariff for revenue only" by voting for this bill. On the contrary, he squarely violates that pledge.

Having shown that this bill is for protection, the only argument germane to it is, Is it a better protective-tariff bill than the McKinley act? Are the benefits of protection more evenly distributed, and the burdens, if any, more equitably laid? To all these questions the American people answer emphatically, no. From beginning to end this bill singles out certain industries and products to which it accords protection, and from others equally entitled it refuses protection. Protection is refused to the miner who digs out the iron ore and the coal to melt it, but is given to the man who burns the coal and lets liquid iron run into the open troughs of sand. You say that coal and ore are raw material. But they are the finished product of the miner, and the rough, shapeless pig of iron when it goes into the rolling-mill or foundry is as absolutely and entirely raw material as is the coal placed under it to melt it, or as is the farmer's wool when it enters the woolen factory.

The honorable chairman of the committee labored hard and long to-day in his speech to show that wool should be put on the free list. I present for his consideration the following telegram, to show what the wool-growers and manufacturers of California think about it—practical men engaged in the business about which they telegraph me—and I place their declarations beside those of the politicians and theorists who bring in such bills as this:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., January 3, 1894.

Hon. W. W. BOWERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the wool-growers, dealers, and manufacturers held this day, it was resolved that we, the wool-growers, dealers, and manufacturers of California, irrespective of party, do hereby protest in the most emphatic terms against changes in the tariff affecting wool and woolens as proposed by the Wilson bill. We assert that to remove the duty from wool and woolens will prostrate, if not wholly destroy, an industry which gives direct employment to 30,000 of our citizens. We call upon you as a representative of California interests to work and vote against these propositions.

I. R. HALL,
B. P. FLINT,
THOMAS DENIGAN,
C. S. MOSES,
JAMES P. HULME,
JOHN E. SHOOBERT,
Committee.
JACOB ROSENBERG, President.
FRED S. MOODY, Secretary.

And in this connection I present this letter from the honorable Assistant Secretary of Agriculture:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 22, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of December 18, covering report on silk culture in Southern California from Mrs. Carrie Williams, and to thank you for transmitting the report to this office.

The entomologist to whom the report has been submitted states that he has long been aware of the perfect adaptability of the climate of California to the culture of the domestic silk-worm, but that the difficulty in the matter of silk culture in this country is the absolute lack of a profitable market for the cocoons. Raw silk is imported from abroad at such low rates as to practically preclude competition on the part of American sericulturists.

Respectfully, yours,

EDWIN WILLITS, Acting Secretary.

Hon. W. W. BOWERS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

As a companion piece to the letter of the honorable Assistant Secretary I present herewith extracts from the letter referred to by him, which was dated at San Diego, Cal., December 29, 1893:

W. W. BOWERS,
House of Representatives, United States:

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 22d instant came to me to-day. I thank you sincerely for the same.

Yes; "the last paragraph" gives the whole silk business away. On page 16 of that "report of silk culture in New South Wales" which I lent you last summer, C. V. Riley, M. A., PH. D., entomologist of the American Government, is quoted as saying "The greater value of labor here as compared with labor in older silk-growing countries has been in the past a most serious obstacle in the United States, but conditions exist to-day that render this obstacle by no means insuperable."

Then he contrasts the conditions and requirements here and in the older silk-growing countries, showing that 20 or 30 cents a day there is as much toward a living as three or four times that amount here. He also shows that there are hundreds of thousands of women and girls all over our country who might produce silk without depriving the laboring classes of their employment, and yet tend to enrich both themselves and their country. Perhaps Mr. Willits was not aware of his superiors' sentiments now before the world on this subject.

You know, Mr. BOWERS, and so do I, that the industry may be made continuous for nine months of the year. This is the strong point in our favor, and it has never been even hinted at before. It is a demonstrated fact now. I have the evidence here. There could not be a greater farce perpetrated on any people than to import silk as raw silk when it is reeled silk. This is the pivot of silk on the tariff. The silk importers call it raw silk as a blind, while they know, and I know, and all who have investigated the subject know, that it is reeled. Every thread of silk is twisted on the reels before it is imported, and yet they call it raw silk. What! Is raw cotton cotton yarn, or is it not raw just as it comes from the pod, not twisted or operated on by machinery?

With due respect, yours,

MRS. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the sentiments of the American people one year and a half ago on tariff reform, the evidence presented us on all sides is overwhelming that to-day the great majority of the people of this nation are in favor of adequate and equitable protection for all American industries; protection not only against the competition of the products of the cheap labor of foreign countries, but protection against the importation of the cheap laborers themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RYAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. KILGORE (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 9, 1894, at 11 o'clock a. m.

He also presented the petition of Jacob Quirbach and 19 other cigar manufacturers of Massachusetts, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Society of Natural History of Boston, Mass., praying for the removal of all duty on scientific and philosophical apparatus used in instruction or research; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition of the Central Labor Union of Lowell, Mass., praying for an investigation by Congress of alleged violations of the eight-hour law. The petition sets forth the eight-hour law as passed by the last Congress in reference to work performed on any Government building. It states certain violations of the law, and asks that they be investigated by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my colleague if he has any information of any workmen in Massachusetts who are overworked? I have not myself been able to find one.

Mr. LODGE. I have not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of 78 ex-Union soldiers and citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of a just and equitable service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of C. O. Frye and a large number of other citizens of Kansas and Missouri, praying for fair treatment in the proposed tariff legislation. They protest against that provision in the proposed tariff bill which prescribes 15 per cent ad valorem on lead ores and admits duty free all ores in which the value in silver is greater than that of lead, and ask that a specific duty be placed upon lead in all ores and drosses. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER presented the petition of A. C. Husey and other cigar manufacturers of Wichita, Kans., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Stewart and 5 other cigar manufacturers of Frankfort; of F. W. Hathaway and 7 other cigar manufacturers of Brookville; of William A. Steffen and other citizens of Indiana; of W. F. Kessler and other cigar manufacturers of Auburn; of J. H. Springer and 10 other cigar manufacturers of Indianapolis, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Dr. G. B. Foscen and other physicians of Texas, praying for the establishment of a bureau of public health within the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also presented a petition signed by 15 members of the bar of Crockett, Houston County, Tex., praying that Houston County be placed in the new judicial district proposed to be created by Congress, to be called the judicial district of South Texas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented memorials of Liken & Bach, of Sebewaing, and of A. J. Bailey & Son, of Leslie, in the State of Michigan, and of the A. J. P. Dewey Stave Company of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the placing of hoops and staves on the free list; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of Edward C. Anthony and 348 other citizens of Negaunee; of Frank Warnberg and 320 other citizens of Republic; of William J. Thomas and 180 other citizens of Negaunee, and of W. H. Johnson and 515 other citizens of Ishpeming, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the removal of the present duty on iron ore; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTMASTERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HUNTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. I am also requested by the committee to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, as the Post-Office Department seems to be desirous of its immediate passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill just reported be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. My attention was called away for a moment. I should like to have the title of the bill read.

The bill was read by title.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg leave to state in explanation of the bill that the subject was referred to the joint commission of the two Houses to investigate and determine what new methods of business are desirable in the Departments of the Government, and they reported it favorably after examining a good many experts in the Post-Office Department. The only object of the bill is to add to section 407——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that the question is not debatable. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not had time to examine the bill. I have intended to ask for information from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury in regard to it. I do not know anything about the change of accounts that is proposed. It may involve a very grave and a very difficult matter, and it may be all right. I should like to have a little time to examine the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I will state the only change made by the bill. Instead of sending the receipts for money deposited to the Postmaster-General or one of his assistants whose duty it is to send them down to the Auditor, the object of the proposed amendment of the law is to send them direct to the Auditor, and the Auditor will pass upon them and send them up to the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department is the accounting officer of the Post-Office Department, and he is also an important officer of the Treasury Department. He performs a double function. Heretofore it has been necessary under the existing law to have these accounts pass through the Postmaster-General and also the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department. In that way, no doubt, some double work is involved, but it seems to be absolutely necessary according to the organization of the Treasury Department. Unless this matter has been understood carefully by the heads of the two Departments who have charge of the subject the change ought not to be made. It is a very delicate question.

Mr. HUNTON. As I understand the report made by the joint commission it has consulted with both Departments. The object of the amendment of the law is to save time and money in the examination of these deposits.

Mr. CULLOM. This is a bill reported from what is known as the Joint Commission to inquire into the status of the laws organizing the Executive Departments, or the members of the commission on the part of the Senate, and it was under consideration some days ago. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who has been very sadly called from the Senate, has a special interest in the bill, and if there is to be any contention over it I ask that it be laid aside until he returns.

Mr. VEST. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. If the Chair will allow me, I will state to the Senator from Missouri that it is a bill reported in the first instance by his colleague from the Joint Commission. It was subsequently referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and it now comes back to the Senate. If there is to be any controversy over the question of its passage, I hope no action will be taken until the Senator from Missouri returns.

Mr. VEST. I join in that request. My colleague will be here on Thursday.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes to the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 1396) to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1397) for the relief of the heirs of William Wakefield, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1398) to secure the rights of pensioners, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 49) for the relief of James P. Veach; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. QUAY. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the joint resolution (H. Res. 93) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle and horses transporting them into Mexico to reimport same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, and for other purposes. I desire, in submitting it, to call the attention of the Senators from Texas, who appear to be in charge of the joint resolution, to the proposed amendment. I move that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1209) to regulate enlistments in the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FORCE IN SUPERVISING ARCHITECT'S OFFICE.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire whether there is need of additional service in the Bureau of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury with respect to the matter of the erection of Government buildings, and report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks for the present consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. Let it lie over.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not rise to object, but I wish to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish permission to say a word. Already the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has the subject before it upon a bill introduced by myself to repeal the limitation of the amount that may be expended for plans. I hope the committee will give attention soon to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being objected to, goes over.

GEORGE P. FURBER.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid George P. Furber, lately clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, the sum of $1,000 from the contingent fund of the Senate, for his services and expenses in preparing the new edition of the Senate Election Cases, and the volume concerning the privileges of the Senate.

INCREASE OF GOLD COIN.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate from what source or sources the gold coin in this country outside of the Treasury of the United States was increased to the amount of $86,869,482 during the fiscal year 1893, as expressed in his recent report for that year, and if derived from different sources, give the sources respectively from which derived and the amount thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the mover, the resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the officers and employés of the Senate who were borne on the rolls of the Senate April 15, 1893, at the close of the special session of the Senate, and who were not borne on said rolls November 3, 1893, at the close of the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay, at the compensation paid them according to law.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GORMAN. The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has been compelled to leave the city on account of severe indisposition, and I ask for him a leave of absence for two weeks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the leave of absence is granted.

REIMPORTATION OF CATTLE AND HORSES FROM MEXICO.

Mr. COKE. I report from the Committee on Finance, at the request of the Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. HARRIS], the joint resolution (H. Res. 93) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle and horses transporting them into Mexico to reimport same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, and for other purposes, with an amendment striking out the preamble and changing the title to correspond. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. Has the mistake which occurred in the preamble been cured?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair would state to the Senator from Indiana that the amendment striking out the preamble and amending the title to make it conform to the body of the resolution is recommended by the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Texas that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] within the last few moments sent to the Secretary's desk an amendment which he proposes to offer to the pending joint resolution. The Chair does not see the Senator from Pennsylvania in his seat.

Mr. COKE. At the proper time I shall offer the amendment if the Senator from Pennsylvania is not here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a drought has existed in Southwest and Northwest Texas for a period of several years so severe as to practically destroy the grass upon the ranges therein, and causing so great a scarcity of grass and water that the stock in said vast region of Texas are and have been for months suffering and dying in large numbers; and

Whereas both sufficient water and grass exist on the south side of the Rio Grande in the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas said Republic has expressed a willingness to enter into reciprocal relations with this Government with a view to relieving the stock interests of Texas for a fixed period of time by permitting the importation of stock into Mexico for grazing purposes only; therefore, in view of the premises, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to permit the owners of cattle and horses in Texas who shall hereafter transport their cattle and horses into the Republic of Mexico to reimport or retransport the same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed for the protection of the revenue of the Government of the United States; and he is also authorized to make such rules and regulations with the Government of Mexico as will protect the revenue of the Government of the United States should a similar privilege for a similar period of time be asked by said Republic of Mexico for any of its citizens under like conditions as exist in the section of Texas before mentioned: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That any owner or owners of cattle or horses in the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized to remove their herds across the Rio Grande into Mexico, for the purpose of grazing, and reintroduce them into the United States without charge for import duties, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That the same privilege above given to citizens of the United States is hereby granted to citizens of Mexico who may desire to introduce their cattle and horses into the United States for like purpose.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall expire within twelve months from the date of its passage.

Mr. HARRIS (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The joint resolution must be first considered and passed, and then I propose to move to strike out the preamble and to amend the title. There is also an amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to submit.

Mr. QUAY. I am informed by the Senator in charge of the joint resolution, who is especially interested in it, that the probable effect of my amendment will be to imperil the final passage of the joint resolution upon its return to the House of Representatives, and therefore I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the committee direct me to move to strike out the preamble and to amend the title. The joint resolution, therefore, will have to go back to the House of Representatives. If the Senator desires to offer his amendment, the reason he assigns for not doing so is not quite sufficient, as the joint resolution will have to be returned to the other House.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding is that the joint resolution would probably fail in the other House if the special amendment which I intended to offer should be adopted, which is to extend the resolution so as to apply to the Territory of Arizona as well as to the State of Texas. Therefore, I have said to the Senator from Texas that I should not press the amendment, and I shall not.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER). The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, the title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle and horses transporting them into Mexico to reimport same into the United States at any time within twelve months from date of the passage of this resolution, and for other purposes."

APPOINTMENT OF DIPLOMATIC AGENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 8th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report to the Senate their opinion as to the cases in which the President may constitutionally send to foreign countries agents, representatives, or commissioners, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and whether or not there was constitutional authority for the appointment in March last, without the advice and consent of the Senate, of Hon. James H. Blount as commissioner to the Hawaiian Islands with the powers conferred upon him by his letter of appointment and such other instructions as were given to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this resolution. There is going forward before the Committee on Foreign Relations an exhaustive inquiry into the condition of the Hawaiian Islands, our relations thereto, and the conduct of our recent minister to those islands, from which committee there will doubtless be a report in due time.

The object I have in asking the Committee on the Judiciary to make the proposed inquiry into the right of the President, without the advice or consent of the Senate, to send Mr. Blount upon his mission of March last, is because I desire to keep, if possible, the question of the constitutional right of appointment of officers of this character separate from a consideration of the merits of the Hawaiian controversy.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Judiciary Committee may as well inquire whether or not Mr. Blount's mission was one which the President could commit to him under the Constitution, and further tell the Senate and the country their opinion as to the cases in which agents or representatives of the President, or commissioners from the President, may be sent abroad without the advice and consent of the Senate.

It was, I repeat, in order to keep this legal and constitutional question separate from the merits of the main controversy that I introduced the resolution, and I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to ask for the adoption of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. VEST. I think it will be evident from the reading of the resolution already adopted by the Senate, which has committed this entire investigation to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the action now asked for by the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely unnecessary. I ask that the Secretary read the resolution under which the Committee on Foreign Relations is now proceeding. They are examining witnesses from hour to hour upon the very question which is involved in this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations shall inquire and report whether any, and, if so, what irregularities have occurred in the diplomatic or other intercourse between the United States and Hawaii in relation to the recent political revolution in Hawaii, and to this end said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths to witnesses.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I repeat, it must be evident from the reading of this resolution that for us to adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is simply to reiterate or rather to reënact what has already been done by the Senate.

I am authorized, although not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to state that the very question submitted in the pending resolution is now being investigated by the Committee on Foreign Relations. By the terms of the resolution already enacted and under which the Committee on Foreign Relations is now proceeding, that committee is instructed to inquire as to any irregularities in the diplomatic intercourse between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands, and if Mr. Blount or anybody else has been appointed irregularly and without the power to make the appointment; that is the very essence of the inquiry which is now going on.

Unless some Senator desires to speak further on the resolution, I move to lay it on the table, and I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ordinarily I should vote for a resolution of this kind, as a matter of course; but under the circumstances, as the Committee on Foreign Relations are now examining into this same matter, I do not feel that I can conscientiously vote to interfere with the examination being made by the Committee on Foreign Relations or disturb or interrupt them. I think, therefore, that to make another inquiry by another committee would be discourteous to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The chairman of that committee is not present, and I think the Senator from New Hampshire had better allow the resolution to lie over.

Mr. CHANDLER. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I withdraw the resolution. I had hoped that the Senate would consent to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day that to-day I should call up the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes. I desire, if there is no Senator prepared to speak upon the bill at the present moment, that it shall be called up at 2 o'clock and made the unfinished business at that hour. I give notice that at 2 o'clock I shall call up the bill; and then, if there is no Senator prepared to speak, we can proceed to consider it or take such other action with regard to it as the Senate may desire.

I only rose for the purpose of saying that, instead of calling the bill up now as I had intended, I shall call it up at 2 o'clock in order that it may be the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, in view of the notice he has given, I will state that I do not believe there will be any objection to the taking up of the bill in order that it may become the unfinished business at the time the Senator indicates, but I ask the indulgence of the Senate with reference to the minority report. I have it in proof form upon my desk, but I have been unable to get certain statistics which I desired to incorporate in it, and therefore shall not be able to present it and have it printed so as to be on the desks of Senators before Monday next. I therefore inquire of the Senator whether, when the bill is taken up at 2 o'clock, if there is no Senator prepared to speak on either side, there will be any objection to the bill going over until Monday next?

I will add further, if the Senator will allow me, that there is no Senator on this side of the Chamber prepared to speak on the subject at this time. Senators undoubtedly will be ready to speak next week. It is for the purpose of reaching an amicable understanding about the debate that I make this suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I should much prefer, so far as I am concerned, to accede to the request of my friend from New Hampshire or any reasonable request of gentlemen on the other side, in regard to the consideration of the bill; but I think, after the time that has elapsed and the notice that has been given, I shall have to call it up and ask the Senate to consider it. If there is anyone prepared to speak, of course that will be the time when he may be heard, but I have no intention of pressing unduly the consideration of the bill, nor do I feel, from what I hear from those who are interested in this matter, that I ought to consent to a postponement of the whole matter until Monday. It may be, if there is no one prepared to go on with the debate at 2 o'clock, that some one may be prepared to speak to-morrow or some subsequent day of the present week. But I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire will have reason to complain of any want of indulgence or want of courtesy on this side in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I have no such anticipation. I should like to ask the Senator whether when the bill is taken up we may expect from him or some other member of the majority of the committee a statement of the reasons why the election laws ought to be repealed, other than those which are contained in the majority report?

Mr. GRAY. I can not say, unless there is some one here whom I do not now know of who may be ready to speak on the bill.

FORT MAGINNIS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar of General Orders under Rule VIII is in order and will be proceeded with.

The bill (S. 335) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned Fort Maginnis military reservation in Montana, under the mining and homestead laws for educational and other purposes, was announced as first in order on the Calendar; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the lands embraced within the abandoned Fort Maginnis military reservation in Montana to be regularly surveyed by an extension of the public survey over the unsurveyed portions thereof.

SEC. 2. That there be, and there is hereby, granted to the State of Montana the use of one section (in square form) of said reservation, to be selected so as to embrace all buildings or improvements constructed upon said reservation for the use of said post, together with the water right belonging to and used by the same, to be used by said State for educational purposes, and to revert to the United States whenever such use shall cease.

SEC. 3. That the remainder of said reservation, after the approval of the survey thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, shall become a part of the public domain and subject to exploration, location, entry, and settlement under the mining, homestead, and other land laws of the United States, and not otherwise: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall limit the operations of any grant of land heretofore made to the State of Montana for educational or other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

The bill (S. 109) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood to commence their suit in the Court of Claims for extra mail service on route No. 16637, extending from Salt Lake City, Utah, to The Dalles, Oregon. It provides that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to adjudicate the same upon the basis of justice and equity, and to render a final judgment therein for the value of such extra mail service performed as aforesaid; and from any judgment that may be rendered in the cause either party thereto may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the bar of the statute of limitations shall not avail in such cases.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri will allow me to make a single suggestion before the report is read.

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether he reported the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I did.

Mr. HOAR. Then I desire to make the suggestion to him. I understand Congress has a perfect right to impose upon the Court of Claims the duty and confer upon it the power, of course, of deciding claims in which the United States is a party according to justice and equity as distinct from a legal obligation. That unquestionably is within the power of Congress. But when it comes to an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, I do not understand that there is any legislative power to authorize that court to decide causes except upon the question of legal obligation, of course including the word "equity" in the sense in which it is used in jurisprudence; but I do not understand that to be what the pending bill says.

For instance, suppose there was a case where an official of the United States had given some assurance to a party so that his claim was not brought within the period fixed by the statute of limitations, anybody would clearly understand that a private person under such circumstances would not insist upon the bar, and it would be a very unjust thing for the United States to do so. We might say to the Court of Claims or to the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other creature of legislation, "Look into that case, and you are authorized to deal with the matter according to your sense of what is equitable and fair and just between the parties." But we can not give an appeal on that question to the Supreme Court of the United States. They are a constitutional court with constitutional powers. They have more than once indicated that they can not be required to perform any but their constitutional functions. So it seems to me if this bill is to pass, the provision for an appeal ought to be stricken out, so far as it includes anything but a legal obligation.

The same proposition was made by the late President Harrison, when he was a Senator, in regard to the French spoliation claims, in which he undertook to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the Senate were satisfied, and I believe that very eminent lawyer himself was satisfied, on discussion, that we could not give an appeal to the Supreme Court under such circumstances.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Massachusetts says in relation to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. So far as I am personally concerned, I should be very glad to strike out the provision that gives an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is conceded that the Court of Claims has jurisdiction to pass on a case referred to it by an act of Congress upon the basis of justice and equity. It seems to me we can safely trust that court with this case. If the Senator desires to amend the bill in that respect, I certainly have no objection.

I will say a word or two to the Senator from Missouri, who has called for the reading of the report, and then if he desires to have the report read, it can be read. This is the tenth report that has been made on this claim, the report being every time favorable. There has never been a dissenting report. It has come from the Committee on Post-offices and Post-Roads under three several organizations of that committee. A similar bill has passed the Senate heretofore three separate times, after discussion at one time, and on the other occasions without discussion, I may say.

I will state the bill in brief. Mr. Chauncey M. Lockwood was the contractor under proposals issued by the Post-Office Department in 1868 to carry the mails from Salt Lake to The Dalles, Oregon. At the time he put in his bid there was a law upon the statute book providing in effect that all mail matter going west, except letter mail, should go by the Isthmus of Panama. After he had put in his bid and the contract had been awarded to him, Congress repealed the act, the effect of which was to throw over this route all mail matter which had previously gone by the Isthmus, and it presented a case of very great hardship.

The testimony in the case (numerous affidavits of postmasters along the route, other mail contractors, and persons having knowledge of the subject) is to the effect that the amount of mail was thereby very largely increased, necessitating a very large increase of means of transportation. As I said, the committees heretofore upon a thorough examination of the case have never had any hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the legal representatives of this man ought to be permitted to go to the Court of Claims for an adjudication to determine whether anything ought to be paid, and if so what amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The five minutes of the Senator from Oregon have expired.

Mr. VEST. I should like to have the report read, especially as to the limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, September 6, 1893, and read as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 109) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood, having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following report:

A similar bill has been under consideration in the committee at three previous sessions, at each of which it was reported favorably, and has passed the Senate on three several occasions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The statement which has just been read by the Secretary would seem to contradict my statement made a moment ago. The Secretary is reading from an old report which was adopted by the present committee.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report and was interrupted by Mr. ALLISON. I object to the further consideration of the bill. We can not deal with it under the five-minutes rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to place the bill under Rule IX, or leave it on the Calendar without prejudice?

Mr. ALLISON. I object to its consideration now. I do not especially desire that it shall go under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will remain on the Calendar under Rule VIII, going over under objection.

Mr. VEST. Speaking for myself, as I asked that the report should be read, I have no objection to the bill if the Senator from Oregon will agree to strike out all after the word "equity," in line 9. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the appellate jurisdiction which it is attempted to confer by the bill. There is another clause in the bill to which I specifically and strenuously object, and that is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his objection?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at present. When the Senators have the bill in hand, so that we may understand precisely what they propose to do with it, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that the bill may retain its place on the Calendar, under Rule VIII.

Mr. VEST. It goes over, then, under objection?

Mr. DOLPH. Let it go over informally, that we may see whether the Senators can not agree about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over without prejudice, holding its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

L. A. DAVIS.

The bill (S. 110) for the relief of L. A. Davis was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. VEST. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The same principle is involved in this bill, and I ask that it may go over with the other one.

Mr. VEST. Yes, let it go with the one just passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice under Rule VIII.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FINANCIAL QUESTIONS.

The next business on the Calendar was a concurrent resolution providing for a joint committee of the two Houses to consider questions of finance, etc.

Mr. VEST. Let that go over. It can not be considered under the five minutes rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution goes over under Rule IX.

SAMUEL COLLINS.

The bill (S. 411) for the relief of Samuel Collins, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Samuel Collins, of Water Valley, Miss., $230.11.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. PASCO, September 7, 1893, as follows:

This case was before the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress. The amount then claimed was $500. The committee, after carefully considering the facts made a favorable report, but reduced the amount to $230, and amended the bill accordingly. In this form it passed the Senate and went to the House of Representatives, where no final action was taken. The present bill is identical with the amended bill which then received the favorable consideration and action of the Senate, and the committee having again considered the case, adopt so much of the former report as sets forth the facts, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The part of the former report thus adopted is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 531, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

"The purpose of the present bill is to pay to Samuel Collins, of Water Valley, Miss., certain bounty money due him for enlisting in Company I, Fifth United States Colored Heavy Artillery, during the late war. His claim for $300 was allowed March 17, 1870, per settlement No. 556104, authorized by joint resolution of Congress of January 13, 1864. The certificate for this sum was made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedman's Bureau in accordance with law, and the money was paid to the chief disbursing officer of the Bureau April 1, 1870, and passed into the hands of C. L. C. Cass, the local agent at Jackson, Miss., on December 3, 1871.

"This agent claimed that he paid the money to the soldier and exhibited a receipt purporting to be signed by Collins and witnessed by two witnesses. The claimant, however, insisted that he had not received the money, and urged his demand against the Government for payment. The agent, Cass, then stated that the money in this case and another had been paid to the wrong persons, but failed or refused to make good his mistake or negligence.

"Thereupon suits were instituted in the name of the United States by the United States district attorney in the district court of the southern district of Mississippi against the agent, Cass, for the recovery of the amounts improperly paid to the wrong parties, or wrongfully withheld by him while acting as agent of the Freedman's Bureau and disbursing officer of the Government.

"The two suits were consolidated, and Mr. Cass in his defense set up a counterclaim against the United States, which on the trial was disallowed, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the United States for the aggregate amounts due to the two soldiers, with interest and costs. An appeal was taken to the circuit court and the judgment of the district court was sustained.

"An execution was issued upon the judgment and the net sum collected upon it was $77.39, and as to the residue of the amount it was returned nulla bona. Of this amount $69.89 was paid to the claimant, Collins, and he has received only that sum upon his bounty claim of $300, the Department ruling, according to law, that no further action could be taken with reference to the payment of the balance without the action of the Congress.

"The record of the Cass suit is before the committee, and a letter from the judge who presided at the trial, who gives a brief history of the case; also a letter from the Second Auditor of the Treasury. Upon these the foregoing statements are based, and the judge's letter is herewith submitted as a part of this report.

"It is very clear that the unpaid part of Collin's bounty is still due to him by the United States. The default was on the part of one of its officers to whom the money was intrusted and it never reached him. The United States has a judgment against the officer for the money which he received and failed to pay, and the prosecution of the suit in its name, by its own officer, is a full recognition of the fact that it was the money of the Government that was withheld and that no payment had ever been made that would discharge its liability.

"The $300 is still due the claimant, less the $69.89 that he received after the partial recovery upon the execution. This leaves a balance of $230.11. "

* * * * * * *

JACKSON, MISS., May 17, 1886.

GENTLEMEN: I learn that there is a bill referred to you providing for an appropriation of some three or four hundred dollars to Samuel Collins, a colored man of Water Valley, in this State, for that amount due him as a soldier in the late war, as bounty money.

The sum of $300 was duly allowed said Collins, and an order drawn in his favor upon one L. C. Cass, then receiver of public money in this city. Cass refused to pay the money to Collins, claiming that he had paid it to some one else. The United States district attorney brought suit against Cass upon this claim, in the name of the United States, for the use of Collins; also, in the name of the United States for the use of another of the same character. These suits were consolidated. Cass defended on the ground that the United States owed him as salary an amount more than the claim. The case was submitted to the court as of a jury.

This was in the district court. A judgment was given in this court for the claims, interest, and costs, from which Cass appealed to the circuit court, by which the judgment of the district court was affirmed and an execution was issued; returned nulla bona.

Collins has never received this money, and should have it.

The written opinion delivered in the district court at the time sets out the facts, and which I herewith inclose. I further state that Collins is a good, industrious, honest, colored man, who has been for many years in the employment of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and much respected by those who know him and for whom he labors.

If Cass is living, and the money can be made upon the judgment against him, the Government can be reimbursed, but Collins ought not to be dependent upon that recovery, but should have his money; he should not be defeated by the embezzlement and fraud of a dishonest agent.

R. A. HILL,
United States Judge.

THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PASCO. The letter from Judge Hill sets forth the principal facts in the case. I will state in addition that this matter has received the careful consideration of the Committee on Claims. It was unanimously passed through the committee during the last Congress and again during the present Congress. A similar bill passed the Senate during the last Congress, but it was not considered in the other House. The claim is eminently just. Collins is entitled to his bounty. It was paid to the wrong person without any fault on his part, and the Government has taken a judgment against the person who illegally and unlawfully received it. I think there is no doubt but that the bill should pass.

Mr. VEST. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Florida to one principle which is adopted in this proposed legislation, and it is a very dangerous one; it has always met with opposition in both Houses of Congress. I refer to the principle or practice that the Government is to be responsible for the defalcation or the criminal act of one of its agents. The principle has never been recognized by Congress, and if recognized it would take immense amounts of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. PASCO. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the money was turned over to the agent of the Government for the purpose of being paid to Collins, and he never paid it to him.

Mr. VEST. He embezzled it?

Mr. PASCO. Yes; and the money never went lawfully from the possession of the Government. The man never received his money; it was stayed in the hands of the Government by the unlawful act of the Government's own agent, and certainly Collins ought not to be responsible under such circumstances.

Mr. VEST. Of course, it is a very hard case upon this colored man. I do not deny that. We have had a great many cases of hardship before us; but the bill establishes a precedent which I do not like and which I have always resisted. I will not object to the bill. It involves a small amount; and the Senate can pass it if it chooses.

Mr. DOLPH. It seems to me that the Senator from Missouri is not quite correct in his statement that this is a case where the Government is not responsible for the default of its agent. The money was the money of the Government, and of course when it was embezzled by the Government's own agent—a receiver of public moneys—it was the loss of the Government. It was never the money of the claimant, and never was paid to the claimant by the Government. Therefore the claimant ought not to be saddled with the loss, and the Government ought not to refuse to pay him because its agent squandered the money without paying the claimant.

Mr. PASCO. I will call attention to the fact that it was the Government who intrusted the agent and not the individual. The following paragraph from page 2 of the report accompanying the bill will, perhaps, make it a little clearer:

It is very clear that the unpaid part of Collins's bounty is still due to him by the United States. The default was on the part of one of its officers to whom the money was intrusted, and it never reached him. The United States has a judgment against the officer for the money which he received and failed to pay, and the prosecution of the suit in its name, by its own officer, is a full recognition of the fact that it was the money of the Government that was withheld and that no payment had ever been made that would discharge its liability.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question.

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that an action was brought in the Federal courts for the recovery of this money, and that a judgment was rendered against the agent, and the execution which was issued was returned nulla bona. Was that judgment entered in the name of the United States?

Mr. PASCO. Yes, in the name of the United States. It was treated at the time as a dishonest act against the United States. The United States prosecuted its remedy through the courts and obtained a judgment, and has the judgment now standing for the amount, but it has never been collected on account of the return of nulla bona.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OWNERS OF THE SHILLINGER PATENTS.

The bill (S. 724) for the relief of the owners of the Shillinger patents was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. PLATT September 8, 1893, and was interrupted by Mr. VEST. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects to the further consideration of the bill. As the present occupant of the chair reported the bill, he trusts that it may go over without prejudice.

Mr. VEST. There is no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over without prejudice.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw the motion, of course.

Mr. HARRIS. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] desires at 2 o'clock to make a certain bill the unfinished business; and I was also inquired of before I left the chair about how long the Senate would be in session to-day. I suppose there will be messages from the President within the next half hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that that can be done just as well to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware can on to-morrow make the same suggestion at 2 o'clock that he might make to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course he can.

Mr. GORMAN. We can resume legislative business about 2 o'clock, if necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, in resuming the legislative session after 2 o'clock, I ask of the Chair what is the order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of business is the Calendar of General Orders under Rule IX.

Mr. GRAY. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2331, known as the elections bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to inform the Senator from Delaware that the minority report is substantially ready to be submitted and printed so that it may be seen by Senators who are desirous of seeing it before Monday next.

When the Senator gave notice this morning of his intention to move to take up the bill after the morning hour, I stated that I thought, while there were Senators on this side of the Chamber who desired to debate the bill, none of them would probably be ready to speak during this week. Therefore I suggest to the Senator, inasmuch as there are several speeches to be made this week, that the bill be allowed to go over until Monday next, retaining its position as the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he can give any prognosis of the course of debate upon the other side of the Chamber, as to the time it will take, the number of speeches that will probably be made, or as to when, so far as he knows, it will be likely that a vote may be reached upon the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have frequently heard that inquiry made in the Senate Chamber, but hardly at this stage of the consideration of an important bill. I have stated frankly the whole situation to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I have no wish at all to press the consideration of the bill to the inconvenience of those who really wish to debate it; and as there has already been notice given of speeches to-morrow and next day on the Hawaiian matter, I am willing to accede, so far as I am concerned, to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I should like to have an understanding that the bill shall be taken up at the expiration of the morning hour on Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the proposition I intended to make to the Senator, that the bill shall be considered the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that that agreement be made?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware make such request?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. GORMAN. Is it the understanding of the Senator in charge of the bill that on Monday next at 2 o'clock it shall be proceeded with, and then be pressed to the exclusion of other matters? I make the inquiry for the reason that we all know other important public matters will be pressing in a very short time, and as the Senate has already been delayed one week and now almost another, I ask whether it be the understanding or intention that the bill shall be proceeded with?

Mr. GRAY. That is my own understanding; and I would say now that I shall feel called upon on Monday, when the bill is taken up as the unfinished business, and thereafter, to press for its consideration until a conclusion is arrived at in regard to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course, the bill is up for consideration to-day; at 2 o'clock on Monday next it will be up for consideration and will be the unfinished business. Does the Senator mean that he shall press for its consideration in any extraordinary method or in any extraordinary haste?

Mr. GRAY. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. Or only in the ordinary method in which the unfinished business is always considered in this body?

Mr. GRAY. I suppose in the ordinary method in which unfinished business is kept before the Senate, if there is any desire to do so by those having it in charge, until some action is taken upon it. That would be my idea as to what is to be done, and I now give notice that I shall do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator whether any extraordinary method of proceeding with the bill with reference to the debate thereon is proposed by him?

Mr. GRAY. The very object, so far as I am concerned, in acceding to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire to this second postponement of the consideration of the bill, would be that there could be no possible objection to going on in the regular order with this bill as the unfinished business. I do not suppose that any of the traditional customs of the Senate—I do not say "courtesy," as that seems to be a tabooed word—will be violated by those who are interested in bringing the pending bill to a conclusion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not suppose so from anything which the Senator from Delaware said. It was only the inquiry of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] which led me to infer that he desired to give notice that the ordinary method of debate on important measures would not be adopted.

Mr. GRAY. The consideration of this matter is an important one. I think it will awaken the attention of the Senate and I have no doubt of the country, or that portion of it who are interested in what goes on here, and that there will be sufficient interest taken in it on both sides to keep the debate alive until we arrive at the natural end of such things—that is, a vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe that myself, and therefore I hope that on Monday next the Senator from Delaware will give us some reasons additional to those contained in the majority report why this bill should pass.

Mr. GRAY. I think those of us who are interested in the passage of this bill are quite justified in asking that the Senate shall, in its ordinary way, continue the consideration of the bill reasonably and continuously until the end is reached.

Mr. CHANDLER. To that course I do not propose to make any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the further consideration of the pending bill be postponed until Monday next, the bill holding its place as the unfinished business in the Senate, and that at 2 o'clock on that day the bill be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware, when the minority report comes in, which will be, I understand, within a day or two at any rate, that the majority report and the views of the minority be printed together for the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. Of course, it is understood that the majority report—and the Senator has been a member of the committee longer than I have been—is a favorable report of the bill with a reference to the House report.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the two reports together if there is no objection. The majority of the committee has, as I understand, adopted the House report, and it will be more convenient, instead of having separate documents, to have the two together. Therefore I ask an order of the Senate, if there be no objection, that when the minority report comes in the two reports may be printed together for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McKEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday, on account of sickness. Had I been present I would have voted, as I have heretofore voted, for the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

EXPENSES OF COMMISSIONER OF RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Railroads, recommending an increase in the estimate for traveling expenses for his office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ASSISTANT UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General, recommending that the appropriation for the compensation of assistants to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases of William Chasteen and Margaret Garrison against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON], from the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which he now reports from that committee.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, that bill has never been reported by any committee.

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the Committee on Appropriations this morning.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] objects. The bill will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PRESENTATION OF A PETITION.

Mr. APSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have here a petition signed by Samuel Irving and 4,038 other workingmen of Fitchburg, Mass., protesting against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill. It is a nonpartisan petition and it is signed by both Democrats and Republicans in about equal numbers. It is the voice of more than four thousand heretofore prosperous workingmen of one place speaking out against the passage of this deceiving bill, which is satisfactory to no one, not even the committee that presents it. I would like to have the preamble and resolutions printed in the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the preamble and resolutions may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is wholly unusual to print these things in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

The committees were then called for reports, but no reports of a public character were presented.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, joint resolution (H. Res. 93) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle and horses transporting them into Mexico to reimport same into the United States at any time before May 1, 1894, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 69) to grant to the State of Oregon townships 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31 south, in ranges 5 and 6 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, for a public park;

A bill (S. 79) to authorize a corrected patent to be issued for the donation land claim of Wheelock Simmons and wife;

A bill (S. 418) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of William E. Woodbridge for compensation for the use by the United States of his invention relating to projectiles, for which letters patent were ordered to issue to him March 25, 1852; and

A bill (S. 1377) for the relief of William Hendershott, of Butteville, Oregon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A bill (H. R. 2796) relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification.

THE TARIFF.

The SPEAKER. Under the order made yesterday, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The order adopted yesterday is as follows:

Resolved, That after the passage of this resolution the House shall meet each legislative day at 11 o'clock a. m. That beginning to-day without intervening motion, except conference reports and reports from the Committee on Rules, the Journal shall be read, business under clause 1 of Rule XXIV shall be disposed of, the Speaker shall call the committees for reports, and then the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) "to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes."

That general debate on said bill shall be limited to the hour of adjournment on Saturday, the 13th of January; that on Monday, the 15th January present, said bill shall be read through, and shall from day to day be open to amendment in any part thereof.

That on Monday, the 29th day of January, at the hour of 12 o'clock m., said bill, with all amendments recommended by or that may be pending in the Committee of the Whole, shall be reported to the House; that two hours' debate be then allowed, and then the previous question shall be considered ordered upon pending amendments and the bill to its passage; that without other motion the vote shall then be taken on pending amendments, on the engrossment and third reading, on a motion to recommit with or without instructions should such motion be made, on the final passage of the bill, and on a motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

That beginning to-day, at the hour of 5:30 o'clock each day the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to general debate on said bill only. General leave to print remarks on said bill is hereby granted.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

[Mr. WILSON of West Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In brief, answering the remarks made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in response to a question submitted to him during his speech by myself, and for which answer he subsequently apologized, I desire to say that I charged his remarks to his associations with slavery before the war and to some of his present associations on that side of the House, and consequently accept his apology.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not make me think that my apology was due rather to myself than to him.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the measure now under consideration has for its avowed object a radical modification of the tariff act of 1890. It involves not only a change of rates, but a complete reversal of an economic policy. The law of 1890 was enacted not only with a view of securing revenue for the support of the Government, but for the further purpose of giving encouragement to the creation of new enterprises and protection to American industries and American workmen against unequal and injurious foreign competition.

In its practical workings it accomplished both these results.

ACT 1890 AND REVENUE.

That act went into effect October 6, 1890, and as a measure for revenue it met, so long as its operation was undisturbed, the needed requirements of the Government. This appears by the following financial statement from the Treasury Department of "Receipts and expenditures" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and subsequent years.

Receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal years 1891 to 1893 inclusive.

Year.	Total revenue.	Total expenditures, including premium.	Excess of revenue over expenditures.
1891	$392 612, 447. 31	$365, 773, 905. 35	$26, 838, 541. 96
1892	354, 937, 784. 24	345, 023, 330. 58	9, 914, 453. 66
1893	385, 818, 028. 78	383, 477, 954. 49	2, 340, 074. 29

From this it will be observed that during each of these years the revenues derived under the act of 1890 were somewhat in excess of governmental needs.

Since the 1st of July, 1893, however, there has been a marked decline in the public revenues until they have actually fallen below the requirements for the public service. During the first six months of the present fiscal year, viz, from July 1, 1893, to January 1, 1894, the total receipts amounted to only $151,715,444, as against $194,251,640 for the corresponding period of 1892, showing a falling off in the revenues to the amount of $42,535,595. The same ratio of loss continued throughout the current fiscal year would result in an alarming deficiency.

I venture to suggest, however, in this connection, that this decline in the public revenues during the present fiscal year is not attributable to any defect in the law of 1890, but rather to the general derangement and prostration of business throughout the country. The ascendency of a political party pledged to the destruction of our protective policy has not only crippled and suspended the operation of our domestic manufacturers, but the importer of foreign fabrics naturally curtails his importations in the hope of securing their admission into our markets upon more favorable conditions.

I confidently assert that if the election of 1892 had resulted in the retention of the Republican party in power, accompanied as it would have been with the assurance of the continuance of the American policy of protection, the effect upon the public revenues as well as the general prosperity of the country would have been entirely reversed. [Applause on the Republican side.] In support of this opinion I beg leave to refer to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 5, 1892, wherein he estimates the revenues of the Government under the act of 1890, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, as follows:

From customs	$210, 000, 000. 00
From internal revenue	175, 000, 000. 00
From miscellaneous sources	20, 000, 000. 00
From postal service	85, 125, 365. 38
Total estimated revenue	490, 121, 365. 38
The Secretary also estimated the total expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, exclusive of the sinking fund at	457, 261, 335. 33
Leaving an estimated surplus of	32, 860, 030. 05

This estimate was made, however, upon the supposition that the act of 1890 was to remain undisturbed. In connection with these estimates the Secretary took the precaution to say in his report:

The estimated receipts are based upon conditions prevailing prior to the late election. Public opinion having directed a change of policy, particularly in the tariff laws, the altered conditions resulting therefrom render it impossible at the present time to estimate the annual income with any marked degree of accuracy, and it is impossible to predict the effect that such proposed radical changes would have upon the future revenues of the Government.

Under all of the circumstances it would be inappropriate in me to undertake to make an estimate other than as already stated, but it is not out of place to remark that the business community having a full knowledge of proposed tariff reductions, the inevitable result will be a falling off in importations and a corresponding decrease in the revenues. The extent of this decrease no one will be able to measure until business shall again adjust itself to new conditions.

A careful review of all the facts fully justifies the opinion that the large increase of receipts ascribed to the marvelous prosperity of the country under the present revenue system would, if continued, enable the Department during the coming fiscal year to meet all obligations without the slightest impairment of its cash, and thereafter continue to show a material improvement in its condition.

President Harrison in his last annual message joined in this apprehension when he said:

It is possible also that this uncertainty may result in decreased revenues from custom duties, for our merchants will make cautious orders for foreign goods in view of the prospect of tariff reductions and the uncertainty as to when they will take effect.

I think, therefore, it may be confidently asserted that if the act of 1890 could have been undisturbed in its operation by public assurance of its continued enforcement instead of public apprehension of its early repeal, it would have yielded sufficient revenue to have met the ordinary expenses of the Government and thus accomplish one of the chief purposes for which it was enacted. If, however, it had failed to yield the full measure of such requirement the deficiency could have easily been supplied without disturbing the business interests of the country by a general revision of the tariff.

ACT OF 1890 AND PROTECTION.

As a measure of protection to American industries and American labor, the act of 1890 in its results more than justified the prediction of its friends. That it would stimulate the development of new enterprises and promote the growth of established industries was confidently asserted, but that its beneficent effect would be so quickly manifest and so marvelous exceeded the highest hopes of the most sanguine. It induced capital to embark in untried ventures, enlarged the field of labor's profitable employment, augmented our domestic and foreign trade, and quickened with a new life the manifold industries of all our people.

President Harrison only affirmed the truth of history when in his last annual message to Congress he said:

So high a degree of prosperity and so general a diffusion of the comforts of life were never before enjoyed by our people.

This exultant declaration made but a little over one year ago, incredible as it seems in the midst of present appalling conditions, was nevertheless grounded on indisputable facts.

The American Economist, a journal of the highest character, in its issue of October 22, 1892, published the result of a partial census of the industrial growth of the country under the act of 1890, which disclosed that from the time that act went into effect, October 6, 1890, 345 new industries had been established in the United States and 108 existing plants extended and improved, demanding an increased outlay of $40,499,050 in capital and the employment of 75,000 additional laborers. In the textile industries alone, during the first six months of 1892, 135 new factories were built, comprising 40 cotton mills (21 of which were located in the Southern States),

48 knitting mills,
26 woolen mills,
15 silk mills,
4 plush mills, and
2 linen mills.

In September, 1882, there were 15,200,000 working spindles, an increase of 660,000 over 1891; while during the year 1891, American mills consumed 2,396,000 bales of cotton in the manufacture of domestic fabrics; it required 2,584,000 bales in 1892, showing an increased consumption of 188,000 bales in a single year.

The report of the commissioner of labor for the State of New York discloses the astounding fact that in 67 different industries in that State the value of the increased output in 1891 over 1890 was $31,315,130.68, involving an increased bestowment of wages of $6,377,925.09.

By the labor report for the State of Massachusetts it appears that 3,745 industries in that State paid to labor in 1891 $129,416,248, against $126,030,303 in 1890, an enlarged expenditure of $3,335,945 in wages alone, with an increase of 7,346 employés and an augmented investment of capital to the amount of $9,932,490.

But, marvelous as was this development, yet nowhere in the field of our industrial achievements was the triumph of our protective system more completely vindicated than in the creation of the American tin-plate industry. It is as astounding as it is gratifying. The report of Mr. Ayer, the special agent of the Treasury Department, shows that this industry has been substantially created in this country as one of the results of the act of 1890. On the 1st day of July, 1891, there was practically no manufacture of tin plate in the United States.

	Pounds.
From July 1, 1891, to September 30, 1891, 5 manufactories produced	826, 922
From October 1, 1891, to December 31, 1891, 11 factories produced	1, 409, 821
From January 1, 1892, to March 31, 1892, 20 factories produced	3, 209, 225
From April 1, 1892, to June 30, 1892, 26 factories produced	8, 200, 751
Making a total production during the first year under the operation of this law of	13, 646, 719
From July 1, 1892, to September 30, 1892, 32 factories produced	10, 952, 725
From October 1, 1892, to December 31, 1892, 32 factories produced	19, 756, 491
From January 1, 1893, to March 31, 1893, 33 factories produced	29, 566, 399
From April 1, 1893, to June 30, 1893, 35 factories produced	39, 543, 587
Making a total production for the second fiscal year of	99, 819, 202

To this should be added the amount of American sheet iron and steel made into articles and wares, tin and terne plated, during the same period, which amounted for the year ending June 30, 1892, to 5,620,867 pounds, and for the year ending June 30, 1893, to 8,802,621 pounds, making an aggregate manufacture of tin and terne plates in the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, of 19,267,586 pounds and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, of 108,621,883 pounds, or a total in two years of 127,889,469 pounds.

In view of this marvelous development, Mr. Ayer was justified in saying in his report of October 24, 1892:

It would seem entirely within the range of possibilities that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, which will be the third year that the law will have been enforced, the United States will produce an amount of tin and terne plate equal to its own consumption, and nearly all of which will be made from American black plates.

Yet in the report of the committee this great and growing industry is characterized as a "bogus enterprise."

What is true in the tin-plate industry is equally exemplified in other interests.

But it is not necessary to multiply instances. I might consume the hour in summoning an array of unimpeachable witnesses to the potent influence of the act of 1890 in establishing and maintaining increased industrial development and promoting the enlarged employment of labor with the resultant prosperity and happiness to all our people. In no single particular did the act of 1890 fail to secure the beneficent results its authors designed, and every prophecy of ill in which its enemies indulged utterly failed of fulfillment.

You said it would develop no new industries—it created them by the hundreds. You said it would bring no resultant benefits to our workmen—it secured for them enlarged employment and increased wages. You said it would enhance the cost of the protected article—it cheapened it to the consumer. You said, it would diminish our foreign trade—it augmented it in 1892 to $1,857,680,610, an increase over the previous year of $128,283,604. You said it would shut out our products from foreign markets—our export trade increased $145,797,388, swelling its volume to $1,030,278,148, the largest ever known in the history of the country and exceeding the value of our imports by $202,875,686. You said it would paralyze our domestic trade—it was never more vigorous than in the years immediately following its enactment. And so every prophecy of ill found swift and complete refutation in increased industrial activity on every hand and enhanced individual and national prosperity. [Applause.]

PRESENT DEPRESSION NOT CAUSED BY ACT OF 1890.

We are therefore justified in asserting that the act of 1890, could its permanency have been assured, would have accomplished the double purpose for which it was enacted—revenue and protection.

It may be answered, however, that the tariff act of 1890 has been in continuous operation since its enactment and is still in force, and yet under it revenues have declined and industries decayed. Conceding this to be true, we deny that the existing deplorable condition of the country is attributable in any degree whatever to the law itself.

The McKinley tariff never closed a mill in the United States [applause], shut up a mine, stopped a wheel [applause], blew out a furnace fire, or drove a single workman into the streets. [Applause.] This general paralysis of business throughout the country comes solely from the ascendency of a political party pledged to the repeal of the act of 1890, and the substitution therefor of a tariff divested of all protective features. With such a party in full control of the Government is it any wonder that domestic manufacturers suspend operations until advised of the conditions under which they must market their output?

Business prudence dictated the suspension of the manufacture of domestic fabrics with high-priced labor until the conditions should be determined upon which the foreign competing products should be permitted to enter our markets. Importers naturally limited their orders to the strict necessities of trade in anticipation of more favorable conditions. And so manufacturer and importer alike prudently suspended business until the Democratic party should fix the terms upon which they would be permitted to resume. When the judge pronounces the sentence of death on the convicted felon there is no change in the law, but the victim is apt to lose interest in human affairs. [Laughter.] On an ocean voyage the chart and compass may remain undisturbed, but with a madman at the wheel and a lunatic on the bridge [laughter] the interest of the passengers will be chiefly centered in the supply of life-preservers. [Laughter.]

This industrial depression came, therefore, not as the result of existing tariff rates, but from an apprehension (it seems now to have been well founded) that these rates were to be so modified as to overthrow and destroy our protective policy, exposing our domestic manufacturers to a ruinous foreign competition and inaugurate in this country an era of free trade with all its attendant evils.

How easily you might demonstrate the beneficial effects of restored confidence. You have but to abandon the policy upon which you have entered, recommit this bill, and permit existing tariff regulations to remain undisturbed, and all our industries will quickly revive. [Applause on the Republican side.] But such an exhibition of wisdom and patriotism is not to be expected of a party pledged to "tariff reform," and American workmen must tramp and starve, great industrial plants must go into disuse and decay, while the Democratic party is attempting to secure revenue from imported goods without conferring protection upon American capital and American labor. [Renewed applause.]

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1892.

And this brings me to the consideration of the general character and purposes of this bill. The Democratic party, in its national platform of 1892, declared, "We denounce Republican protection as a fraud. * * * We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purposes of revenue only."

No political party in the United States in its public declaration of principles was ever before bold enough to assail a protective tariff as unconstitutional, and no parallel to this extreme declaration can be found in the whole history of our country outside of the South Carolina ordinance of nullification. And in this connection it is curious to note the close harmony between the two declarations.

SOUTH CAROLINA ORDINANCE OF NULLIFICATION.

Whereas the Congress of the United States by various acts purporting to be acts laying duties and imposts on foreign imports, but in reality intended for the protection of domestic manufacturers—hath extended its just powers under the Constitution: We, therefore, the people of the State of South Carolina, in convention assembled, do declare and ordain and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the several acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States purporting to be laws for the imposing of duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities—are unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States and violate the true meaning and intent thereof, and are null, void, and no law.

It will be seen, therefore, that the ground on which the Democratic nullifiers stood in 1832, and from which they were driven by the stern patriotism of Gen. Jackson, is at last reoccupied in 1892, sixty years later, in force, by the whole Democratic party. And it is not difficult now to understand the alacrity with which the Northern Democracy obeys the command to take position in support of the unconstitutionality of a protective tariff and the confidence with which it seems to be inspired, reënforced as it is by the Southern wing of the Democratic party (now unhappily dominating the Republic) which evinced its deep-seated hostility to the principle of protection by ingrafting in its Confederate constitution the following expressed inhibition:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and excises for revenue only, necessary to pay debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes or importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find the Democratic party in 1892, with its two wings reunited, the South in the lead, moving under the Confederate banner of free trade to the complete overthrow of our protective system.

THE ISSUE BETWEEN PARTIES.

Before proceeding further in this debate it is well to note the exact point in controversy between the two contending political forces. It may be safely asserted that both parties believe in raising some portion of the needed revenues for the support of the Government by imposing duties on foreign products coming into our markets, and the only points at issue are:

First. The class of articles upon which these duties shall be levied; and Second. The rate of duty they shall bear.

On the one hand, the Democratic party insists that revenue is the only lawful purpose for which any duty can be imposed and that such exactions therefore must be for revenue only, regardless of the conditions or necessities of American industries or American labor; and to that end they would admit free of duty, indiscriminately, all products which they are pleased to denominate "raw material," and impose a rate of duty on manufactured articles sufficiently low to insure their importation into our market, and thereby secure the only purpose of a Democratic tariff, namely, "revenue."

On the one hand, the Republican party believes in a tariff which, while yielding revenue for the support of the Government, shall at the same time be so adjusted as to promote the establishment and maintenance of domestic industries and the protection of American workmen; and to that end would admit free of duty all articles raw or manufactured (except luxuries) coming from any place on the face of the globe, the like of which are not or can not be advantageously produced in this country, and impose duties only on the things we do or can produce and make that rate high enough to measure the difference between the cost of the foreign and domestic product, and by that means stimulate the development of all our resources and insure the employment of all our people.

Circumscribed within these narrow limits lies the whole field of the controversy, and on this ground the contending political forces confront each other in open and determined hostility. The Republican party stands, I believe, securely intrenched behind the bulwark of the American policy of protection and will resist to the last the combined forces of free trade from whatever quarter they may come, confident of ultimate and triumphant support by the enlightened judgment of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

In making this assault upon our protective system the Democratic party seeks to justify its course upon the theory expressed in its Chicago platform and reiterated in the report of the majority, "That the Federal Government has no constitutional power to collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue only;" and that as the existing tariff is confessedly constructed for the purpose of securing both revenue and protection, it becomes necessary to readjust the schedules of duties to a revenue basis, and so avoid not only the fact but the suspicion of intended protection to any domestic industry, and thus conform to the Democratic construction of the National Constitution. It is for such purposes, I suppose, and such only, that this revision is undertaken.

There can scarcely be a necessity at this late day to enter into a defense of the constitutionality of a protective tariff. When it is remembered the Federal Constitution was adopted to remedy the defects of the government of the confederation, among which none was more glaring than the want of power in the central government to prescribe and enforce a uniform system of customs duties, it is inconceivable that the framers of that instrument would neglect the correction of the very evils which its adoption was intended to remove.

Seven years of trial of the confederation demonstrated the necessity of a national government invested with power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," and "to provide for the common defense and general welfare," the want of which under the confederation exposed the States to domestic jealousy and discord and the machinations of foreign powers. The Congress being powerless under the confederation to enact tariff laws without the consent of all the States, and that consent being withheld, each State undertook the regulation of its own trade with foreign nations and with the other States upon such terms as seemed most advantageous to itself.

This policy resulted in a multiplicity of custom laws as numerous as the States. One State would impose certain duties on foreign goods, while an adjacent State would for the purpose of securing trade admit the same class of goods into its ports free of duty, and so the selfish policy of each exposed all to the cupidity of foreign powers. Domestic industries, brought into existence and maintained through the exigency of war, were swept down in peace by a flood of imported goods, and manufacturer and laborer alike involved in a common ruin. It was to remedy this condition that "the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations" and "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" was conferred by the Federal Constitution upon the National Government.

Mr. Webster, in 1833, well said:

The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far at least as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the Constitution.

Again in 1844, he said:

In Colonial times and during the time of the convention, the idea was held up that domestic industry could not prosper, manufactures and the mechanic arts could not advance, the condition of the common country could not be carried up to any considerable elevation, unless there should be one government to lay one rate of duty upon imports throughout the Union; regard to be had, in laying this duty, to the protection of American labor and industry.

I defy the man in any degree conversant with the history, in any degree acquainted with the annals of this country from 1787 to 1789, when the Constitution was adopted, to say that protection of American labor and industry was not a leading, I might almost say the leading motive, South as well as North, for the formation of the new Government. Without that provision in the Constitution it never could have been adopted.

Fisher Ames, a member of the first Congress under the Constitution, in debate on the first tariff bill, said:

I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than by any other cause. The want of an efficient government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare.

But of more value than the individual opinion of men, however eminent, is the contemporaneous interpretation of the Constitution as expressed in the earliest legislation under it. The first act of any moment in the First Congress, suggested by Hamilton, presented by Madison, and approved by Washington, related to the tariff, and its purpose was declared in the preamble as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on imported goods, etc.: therefore be it enacted.

That act received the official approval of Washington July 4, 1789, and was everywhere hailed as a second declaration of independence. If it had been in violation of the Constitution none would have been more apt to discover it than Washington himself, who, as president of the convention which framed it, must have been fully possessed of the scope and spirit of that instrument. In addition to this the early Presidents took frequent occasion to refer approvingly to the course of national legislation looking to the protection of domestic manufactures.

President Washington, in his last annual message to Congress, said:

Congress has repeatedly and not without success directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

President Adams spoke of—

The wisdom and efficiency of the measures which have been adopted by Congress for the protection of commerce.

Thomas Jefferson spoke of the duty of Congress:

To protect the manufacturers adapted to our circumstances.

In one of his messages to Congress, when the question of disposing of the surplus revenues was arresting public attention, and the suggestion was made to dispense with some part of the customs duties, he took occasion to say:

Shall we suppress the imposts and give that advantage to foreign over our domestic manufacturers?

Again he said:

The general inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to a dependency upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in caves or dens. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comforts. The prohibiting duties we lay on all articles of foreign manufacture which prudence requires us to establish at home, with the patriotic determination of every good citizen to use no foreign article which can be made within ourselves, without regard to difference of price, secures us against a relapse into foreign dependency.

In 1809 Mr. Jefferson wrote to Mr. Humphrey as follows:

My own idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw materials.

In 1817 he was elected a member of the "Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Manufactures," and in his letter of acceptance said:

The history of the last twenty years has been a significant lesson for us all to depend for necessities on ourselves alone, and I hope twenty years more will place the American hemisphere under a system of its own, essentially peaceable and industrious and not needing to extract its comforts out of the eternal fires raging in the Old World.

President Madison, justly recognized as the "Father of the Constitution," in a special message to Congress in 1809, said:

It will be worthy of the just and provident care of Congress to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

And again in 1815:

But there is no such subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress than consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence and obtained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant attention of Congress.

James Monroe, in his inaugural address, among other things, said:

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for raw materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

President Monroe, in his seventh annual message to Congress, said:

Having formerly communicated my views to Congress respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures, and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add that those views remain unchanged. I recommend a review of the tariff for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country.

President John Quincy Adams, in a message to Congress in 1828, speaking of our agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, said:

All these interests are alike under the protecting power of legislative authority.

But it is needless to continue these citations. Enough appears to establish beyond controversy that the want of power under the Confederation to impose duties on imports with a view not only of raising revenue but of insuring the development and protection of domestic manufactures, was one of the most potent reasons urged in favor of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and that these powers were embraced in that instrument and promptly invoked by the National Government without hesitancy or question.

Great signification is justly attached to the construction of the Constitution, by those who were first called upon to administer it, in view of the fact that Washington, the president of the convention which framed it, became the first executive officer to enforce it, and of the thirty-eight men who considered, framed, and signed that instrument fifteen were chosen members of the first Congress organized under it, among whom were Roger Sherman, Robert Morris, and James Madison, while Fisher Ames, Rufus King, Richard Henry Lee, and James Monroe, men scarcely less noted for their patriotism and sound judgment, participated in the work of giving force and effect to the Federal Constitution.

In the light of these facts you will have some difficulty, I apprehend, in convincing the American people that a tariff adjusted in the interest of domestic industries is in violation of the Constitution. Intelligent people will not be apt to discard the patriotic opinions of Washington, Madison, Jefferson, and their contemporaries and accept the partisan interpretation of modern Democracy.

Having said this much in answer to the assumption that a protective tariff is unconstitutional, let us pass to a consideration of the substance of this measure.

TARIFF REFORM.

And here we have at last translated into apt phrase the hitherto mysterious doctrine of "tariff reform."

You have now conjured with these words for the last time. Having ceased to be mysterious they will lose their magic power to deceive and mislead the people. "Tariff reform" is finally interpreted to mean "free raw material" and reduction of duties on competing foreign products entering our markets below the protective point, regardless of the consequences to American industries or American labor. This is "tariff reform."

Before proceeding to a specific explanation, I desire to say that this measure as a whole stands without a parallel in the history of proposed tariff legislation in this country. It was framed with the evident intention of carrying out that portion of the Democratic platform and policy which declared for a "tariff for revenue only," and is the boldest step yet taken by any party in the United States in the direction of free trade—a step which, if it shall find popular following in this country, will certainly lead to individual disaster and national bankruptcy.

But daring as is the advance made, it seems from the report of the committee that while adhering to the doctrine of the unconstitutionality of the protective tariff, the majority have been restrained in their headlong course toward free trade by the "existence of great industries" which impede their progress and which they hesitate to utterly destroy; and then in apologetic tone assure their followers and the country that "the bill is not offered as a complete response to the mandate of the American people" and does not "profess to be purged from all protection."

Are we then to understand that further "response" from the Democratic party may be expected, in which the tariff is to be wholly "purged from all protection" and the destruction of American industries and the pauperization of American workmen fully consummated? Is this the prospect you hold out to a people already driven by your threatened policy to the very verge of despair and desperation? If such be your purpose, the only escape then lies in the hope that long before you are able to complete your desolating work an indignant people will drive you forever from power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And in this connection I desire to say that, whatever may have been the purpose of the majority in framing this bill, that in so far as it conforms to the Democratic platform of 1892 it will, if enacted into law, prove disastrous to the interests involved, and in so far as it fails to redeem the party pledges it is either a confession of error or an exhibition of cowardice. [Applause.] If in error you ought to be patriotic enough to promptly avow it, abandon the policy upon which you have entered, and permit the country to resume its industrial prosperity. If, on the other hand, you still adhere to the principles of the Chicago platform and have failed to embody them in this measure, you have openly betrayed the confidence of the people who intrusted you with power.

LOSS OF REVENUE.

But upon examination of this bill, in connection with the estimated revenues it will secure, the startling fact is disclosed that as a revenue measure it is confessedly inadequate, it being conceded that upon the basis of last year's importations it will occasion a serious loss of revenue estimated anywhere from sixty to seventy-five millions of dollars annually, to be supplied either by an enormous increase of importations to the detriment or destruction of domestic industries or by resorting to a system of internal taxation as pernicious as it is offensive. The final determination of the majority touching the extent of internal taxation to be imposed, has not yet been disclosed by the Executive.

And in this connection the query is naturally suggested whether this sudden conversion of the Democratic party to a system of direct internal taxation is not attributable in a large degree, if not chiefly, to the fact that it is, if not the most direct, at least the most effective method of insuring the ultimate destruction of our protective system. For it is apparent, the more revenue secured from internal sources the less to be derived from duties on imports, and the less imposed and collected on foreign goods the more nearly we approach absolute free trade.

THE FREE LIST.

The first proposition arresting attention in this bill is the proposed transfer of one hundred and thirty-one articles from the dutiable to the free list. Of these, twenty-nine are taken from the chemical schedule, three from the schedule of earths and earthenware, fourteen metals and manufactures of metals, nineteen articles of wood, two from the schedule of spirits, six from flax, hemp, and jute, and their manufactures; twenty-seven agricultural products, twenty items of wool from the unwashed clip to the scoured fleece and finished noil, and eleven articles from the schedule of sundries, together with coffee, skins, and hides released from the possibility of customs exactions by the total repeal of the reciprocity provision of the act of 1890.

It will not escape notice in this connection that upon examination of the list of articles thus transferred from the dutiable to the free list the interests of the farmer seem to have been selected for special assault and destruction, as nearly one-half of the items embraced in this proposed transfer are the fruits of domestic husbandry. Even the duty of 20 per cent ad volorem accorded the American farmer on his wheat, corn, rye, oats, buckwheat, and their manufactures is to be removed, and all these products admitted free of duty from any country extending like privileges to us. The way is thus open to the Canadian farmer to invade our markets at will.

But let us look for a moment at the scope of this proposition as a whole. Of the class of articles thus proposed to be transferred to the free list, there were imported into the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, $50,933,409 worth, upon which there was collected under existing law the sum of $13,789,022 of public revenue. The immediate effect of this proposition, therefore, if adopted, will be to open our markets to the free importation of nearly $51,000,000 of foreign products, accompanied with the voluntary surrender of nearly $14,000,000 of annual revenue.

It is a free donation to foreigners, at a time, too, when the Treasury of the United States is in pressing need of increased resources. There is not in it even a suggestion of reciprocity by which some concessions might be secured for our surplus products in the markets of the nations thus favored with free entrance into our own. It is a bald free-trade gift—the price paid for a Democratic theory.

Such a proposition would at any time arrest public attention, but to be made in the presence of a depleted Treasury, and with its Secretary asking to be clothed with power to issue bonds on which he may borrow money to meet the current expenses of the Government, is a proposition so startling as to challenge the credulity of mankind. [Prolonged applause on Republican side.] There is only one explanation possible, and that is found in the exclamation of an English statesman, "It is free trade gone mad." The present free list ought to be sufficient to satisfy the demands of the most advanced free trader. The act of 1890 enlarged it to the very limit of safety to American industries and American labor.

The value of our free imports increased from $266,103,048 in 1890 to $444,172,064 in 1893, while our dutiable imports fell off from $507,571,764 in 1890 to $400,282,519 in 1893. And yet it is proposed to increase our free imports to more than $490,000,000, while reducing the dutiable to $354,000,000.

But, serious in its results as this proposition would seem to be, yet its far-reaching consequences can only appear when we consider the class of products to be accorded free entrance into our markets. If the articles proposed to be transferred to the free list were exclusively of foreign production and therefore not to come in competition with American industries and American labor, no advocate of the American system would make complaint, however extended the catalogue, for it would be in harmony with the theory of protection.

But the one hundred and thirty-one articles proposed to be transferred to the free list are not exclusively of foreign origin. They are of domestic production, built up and sustained by the investment of American capital and the employment of American labor. They are the products of our factories, our mines, our forests, our mills, our flocks and our fields, which you propose thus to expose to the merciless and unrestrained assault of our foreign rivals. And to what end? That the manufacturers, forsooth, may have the advantage of "free raw material."

Heretofore if there was any one class of our people the Democratic party inveighed against more than another it was the manufacturer, but he has now, it seems, become the object of your deepest solicitude, while the humble laborer for whom you have professed so much anxiety in the past is abandoned to an unequal battle with his foreign antagonists. The hardy miner, the intelligent flock master and farmer, and all the producers of what you are pleased to call "raw materials," are to be forced to contend unaided with the cheapest labor on the globe that the manufacturer may enjoy the boon of "free raw material."

Why should not the producers of raw material be accorded the same consideration as the manufacturer of that material into his finished product? Why should the miner in his perilous vocation be utterly abandoned, while the workers in the raw material which he produces are given some measure of consideration? Why should the farmer, having invested his all in fields and flocks, be forced into an unequal competition with Australia and South America, while the manufacturer of woolen fabrics secures some measure of protection? And in this connection it is but just to say that the woolen manufacturers as a body demand no such unjustifiable discrimination.

But I notice every "tariff reformer" urges free raw material as an indispensible adjunct to the consummation of his theory. "There is method in his madness." No one understands better than he that free raw material will be swiftly followed by free manufactured goods. It will be protection for all or protection for none. [Applause.] When you force the producers of raw material into unrestrained competition with the world the manufacturers of this raw material into the finished fabric will speedily share the same fate.

How long do you suppose the wool-growers of this country will submit to be taxed, as you are pleased to call it, on their woolen goods, after you have forced their wool onto the free list to the destruction of their flocks and their fortunes? Human nature is very much the same everywhere and the spirit of retaliation will find swift and terrible expression. When you have completed this proposed transfer it is the beginning of the end of the protective system in the United States; and I apprehend it is the knowledge of this fact which inspires the free trader of to-day with unflagging zeal in the advocacy of free raw material.

Yet I confess that in the light of this measure it is somewhat difficult to understand the Democratic idea of raw material.

For example, you put one class of clays on the free list, while another, adapted to the use of the same industry, is made dutiable. One would suppose that clay was about as "raw" a material as could be imagined. Yet, while putting the clays of New Jersey on the free list, you impose a duty of $2 a ton on the clays of Florida, Georgia, and other Southern States. One would surmise what was raw material in New Jersey would be "raw material" in Florida. But it seems not. One would suppose that hoop iron would be the same, regardless of the uses to which it is applied. Not so. On the farmer's bucket it is taxed, around the planter's cotton it is free. Washed wool and washed clay ought to hold the same place in Democratic philosophy. Yet the wool of the Northern farmer is "raw material," while the washed clay in the hands of the Southern producer is a highly finished product. It is useless, however, to attempt to extract from this bill the Democratic conception of raw material. The truth is, there is no such thing as raw material, except in nature's storehouse.

The iron in the mountain, the coal in its native bed, the trees in the forest, the stone in the quarry—these are raw material in their natural condition, and untouched by the hand of labor would remain raw material forever and continue absolutely valueless. But when labor touches them and transforms them to the uses of mankind that moment they cease to be raw material and become the finished product of invested capital and expended labor. You may continue to delude yourself with the theory that these things are raw material, but you will not deceive the intelligent labor of this country, through whose mighty energies they are produced.

But let us go a step farther and consider the effect upon the industries involved before this proposed free list shall be enacted into law. The only reason assigned by the advocates of this measure in support of free raw material is that it will give cheaper raw material and so bring a resultant benefit to the consumers of the finished product into which such material enters. The whole argument proceeds and is grounded upon that theory. The contention is that the manufacturer can secure his raw material, if free, cheaper elsewhere than in the United States.

If it will not give him cheaper raw material, either by purchasing abroad or forcing our domestic producers down to the level of the world's market, then this step is without rhyme or reason and the whole bill formed upon this assumption must be recast. That the manufacturer will secure his raw material, when free, in the cheapest market goes without saying, and it becomes important to inquire, therefore, what effect free trade in raw material will have on domestic producers of the competing product.

WOOL AND IRON ORE.

Among the articles proposed to be transferred to the free list are wool and iron ore. When this shall have been consummated the manufacturer of woolen goods will surely secure his raw material in the cheapest market. He will draw his supply of wool from Australia, South America, Turkey, and South Africa, where lands are practically free and climatic conditions conduce to the cheapest production. The manufacturer of pig iron will turn to Spain, Cuba, England, and the world s sources of cheapest supply for his iron ore. This will inevitably result in one of two things—the destruction of our flocks and the closing of our mines or the lowering of our conditions to the level of our foreign competitors.

"To this complexion we must come at last."

In the case of the American wool-grower it is not within his power to reach the conditions, if such a step was desirable, which would enable him to successfully compete with the foreign producer. High-priced lands, a rigorous climate, American wages and the cost of transportation, offer an irresistible barrier to the successful prosecution of this industry in the United States under free trade.

How can our flock masters contend with Australia in an open market where 600,000,000 pounds of wool are produced annually from flocks grazing on lands which are rented for a penny an acre a year? Or with the 460,000,000 pounds of annual production in South America, where lands are free and labor commands only 8 cents a day? Or with Russia's 350,000,000 pounds produced with 15 cents daily labor? Or with South Africa, Turkey, and Asia, where 10 cents a day is the highest recompense awarded in this industry?

Under free trade these countries could put their wool down in our markets at a price less than the cost of production here, and the consequence would be the complete destruction of this great and growing industry in the United States. This would be attended with the sacrifice of 47,000,000 sheep, in which 2,000,000 farmers have invested $100,000,000 in capital, and the abandonment of extensive ranches with all their valuable improvements. It is idle to contend that with free wool this industry could survive.

Our farmers are too intelligent to be deceived, and they are already selling their flocks or driving them to the slaughter pen in the hope of saving something from the general wreck which is sure to follow. I regret that time and space forbid the presentation of protests in my hands, from thirty-four States and Territories, against the consummation of this atrocious outrage. Yet this would probably fall now upon deaf ears, but the time is not far distant when they will be heard. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in his speech of yesterday, in advocacy of free wool, summoned to his support the statement of a Representative from the State of Texas, to the effect that the industry of wool-growing can be carried on as cheaply in that State as anywhere on the globe; and that free wool would not therefore be injurious to the flock masters of that State. Against this assertion I interpose a remonstrance fifty feet long from the citizens of Texas bearing eleven hundred signatures, in condemnation of the policy of free wool. Let this be your answer [unrolling the remonstrance]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Turn to the iron industry; with free trade in iron ore how can the American miner in Michigan and elsewhere in the United States successfully contend with the miners of England, Spain, Cuba, and the ore-producing countries of the old world? The average wages in the Lake Superior mining district for drillers or miners is $2.25 to $2.75 per day while the same class of laborers in England receive $1.21 and in Spain only from 60 to 72 cents per day. With us, common laborers receive from $1.60 to $2 a day, in England from 72 to 84 cents, and in Spain 36 to 60 cents a day. Even the boys in the Lake Superior mines receive from $1 to $1.25 per day, while boys and women in England secure from 24 to 60 cents, and in Spain 24 to 36 cents a day. It is in evidence before the Ways and Means Committee that the wages of miners on Lake Superior are more than 3½ times those of Bilbao, and more than double those in the Cleveland (English) district. With these conditions staring us in the face there is no escape from the conclusion that with free iron ore we must either close our mines or reduce the cost of production to the lowest level of the world's supply.

But to cheapen production involves a reduction of wages to the level of Spanish and Cuban labor—a proposition repugnant to every instinct of American manhood and to be resisted, I trust, to the last, by the laboring people of this country through every legitimate instrumentality at their command. Already the suggestion of free trade in iron ore has closed our mines, forced the miners out of employment, and driven a people who were never before dependent upon public charity to beggary and want. The good people of my State, in every town and hamlet, are already contributing to their necessities.

I hold in my hand a memorial from the citizens of the city of Bessemer, in the State of Michigan, addressed to the President of the United States, setting forth the conditions of the miners in the upper peninsula, from which I desire to make some extracts.

Hon. Grover Cleveland, President of the United States:

The citizens of the city of Bessemer, in the county of Gogebic and State of Michigan, regardless of party or political affiliations, in meeting assembled, view with alarm the reported action of the Ways and Means Committee of Congress in recommending that iron ore be placed upon the free list, and respectfully submit for your consideration:

That during the year 1892 the number of men directly employed in the mines of this county, in the mining of iron ore, was not less than 6,000, whose average wage-earning power were from $350,000 to $400,000 monthly.

In addition there was expended by the mines monthly for mining-timber, wood, lagging, and mining supplies $150,000 to $200,000, which indirectly gave employment to over one thousand additional workmen, and that the prosperity of this county and its people is dependent almost wholly upon the prosperity of the iron industries.

Owing to doubts, fears, and uncertainty as to the policy of the General Government relative to the protection of American industries and American labor, and especially as to the reported intention to change existing tariff schedules and class iron ore as raw material and place it upon the free list, every mine in this county has been closed down to await the settlement of tariff legislation, and that thousands of laborers have been thrown out of employment and are unable to obtain work at any price, and that much want and suffering exists in this community in consequence.

The only labor now employed in this county is that engaged in manning the pumps and keeping the mines free from water, and that the whole number thus employed will not exceed 400 men all told, whose average monthly earnings will not exceed $12,000 to $15,000.

Thousands of men in this county, able and willing to work, are unable to secure employment, are in actual want, and hundreds of honest and deserving families are in consequence obliged to ask public aid and subsist on public charity.

The expenditures for poor purposes in the county of Gogebic during the year 1892 did not exceed $10,000, and that the expenditures of eight months in the present year have already exceeded $25,000, and that owing to the approach of winter, and the destitution and want existing in this section, the expenditures for poor purposes must be greatly increased.

Owing to the calls made upon it the funds of this county, available for poor purposes, have been exhausted, and all funds available for other purposes have been applied to relieve want and suffering among our people, and that the county treasury is now empty and there will be no funds therein available for any purpose before March 1, 1894.

To relieve the pressing necessities of the poor, orders are being issued by the commissioners, but that owing to there being no available funds to take up such orders, the same are becoming valueless, and that unless the mines resume work at an early date great suffering and distress will result.

Investigation shows that there are in this city alone one hundred families, about five hundred persons, mostly women and children, dependent upon public charity and in pressing need of immediate assistance in the shape of food and clothing to relieve their wants, and that the condition of affairs in other sections of the county is comparatively no better than the condition of affairs in this city.

The classing of iron ore as raw material and placing it upon the list of articles to be admitted free of duty will be destructive to the mining industries of this section and the prosperity of our people, and we respectfully, but none the less earnestly, protest against such contemplated action by the Administration and the present Congress, and urge not only that the present duty be retained, but increased as well, believing that such action would bring to the depressed industries of our section a return of its past prosperity.

We respectfully submit that iron ore in its natural state, and in place in the earth before human labor has been expended upon it, is raw material, and its value is determined by the royalty demanded upon it by the owners of the soil, which on this range averages 35 cents per ton. The cost of a ton of iron ore delivered to the furnaces at Lake Erie points is $3.96.

To which must be added the cost of superintendence and interest on the capital invested. And we protest against iron ore being classed as raw material when more than ten-elevenths of its value at the furnace, where it is consumed, consists of the labor and cost of its production and transportation.

The iron ore from our mines loaded for transportation to the furnace is the finished product of our people. The finished product of our mines is the raw material of the producers of pig iron, and what is the finished product of one industry is ever the raw material of the next in the ascending scale of manufactures.

We submit that every article into which human labor has entered and has increased or multiplied its value, in order to render it available for the use of man, has ceased to be raw material, and we demand, as a matter of simple justice, that the product of American labor, whether in the forest or on the farm, in the factory, or in the deepness and darkness of the mine, shall be protected, to the end that the American markets be reserved for American labor and be freed from competition for bare existence with the cheaper and degrading conditions surrounding the labor of other lands.

We therefore sincerely but earnestly protest against iron ore being classed as raw material and placed among the list of articles admitted free of duty, and we ask, in the name of common humanity, in the name of our desolated homes and suffering poor, that this nation be not committed to a policy that must prove destructive alike to its industries and the prosperity of its people.

It is a condition not a theory that confronts us, and confronted by this condition, we respectfully ask that should you as Chief Executive feel bound to recommend in your annual message the adoption of the tariff policy outlined by the Ways and Means Committee, that you submit this our respectful but earnest protest against the adoption of such a policy to the Congress of the United States.

Such is the condition of labor in a single city in my State. I submit also the following protest from the board of supervisors of the county of Gogebic in confirmation of the foregoing memorial:

To the Congress of the United States:

The board of supervisors of Gogebic County, State of Michigan, in regular meeting assembled, at the court-house of said county, this 13th day of December, 1893, respectfully but most earnestly remonstrate against the reported intention of the House Committee on Ways and Means to class iron ore as a raw material and as such put it on the free list.

Iron ore is the only product our people have to dispose of; its production employs our labor, supports our population, and maintains our homes. In fact, without it this county and the entire Gogebic range become waste and depopulated and its people must seek employment elsewhere.

Our people have invested their all, the accumulations of years of prosperity, in the Gogebic iron range and its industries, and we submit that it is neither fair nor just to ruin a whole community in order that the consistency of a theory may be demonstrated.

So long as other products are protected, we ask the same treatment for ours, and we ask it as a matter of right.

The condition of affairs in this county to-day is indeed appalling, and must appeal to every human heart at all sensitive to the promptings of justice.

Six months ago there were employed in the mines of this county 5,000 men; to-day there is less than 500.

The average wage then paid was $1.85 per day; to-day the few employed are working for $1 and less, and thousands of men able and willing to work are unable to obtain employment even at the wages named.

Our county treasury is empty, and poor orders to the amount of some $15,000 outstanding and more accumulating every month. Taxes will not be paid, as our people have not the funds to pay with, and there are now not less than 5,000 persons in the county receiving public aid and dependent for support on outside public charity, and the governor of this State has already in behalf of our people by proclamation called upon the charitable people of Michigan for assistance.

The enforcement of your committee's proposed policy means simply the depopulation of this county, and the practical confiscation, by destruction, of all that our people have accumulated by economy and prudence during more prosperous times.

We appeal to you, therefore, in the name of our constituents and in the name of our equal rights as American citizens, to stay this ill-advised undertaking and let iron ore remain as it now stands—one of the products of American enterprise and labor—and as such entitled to equal treatment with every other American interest and industry.

EFFECT ON OTHER INTERESTS.

If the mere approach of free trade produces such appalling results, who can depict the awful consequences when it shall take full possession of this industry. But this is not all. Dependent upon the successful operation of our mines there are other interests of vast concern which under free trade will surely be jeopardized and destroyed. In the Lake Superior district alone $71,325,122 have been invested in mines; $10,885,665 in docks built and used exclusively for shipping ore; $32,014,594 have been expended in the construction of railways leading from these mines to the docks; $29,933,107 have gone into transportation facilities on the Great Lakes: $12,392,880 into docks and equipments for receiving and distributing this ore on the ports of Lake Erie, and $26,343,617 invested in railways for conveying this ore from these ports to inland mills and furnaces, making a grand total of $182,894,985 of invested capital, all of which is to be imperiled or destroyed. The mines will become valueless, the railways abandoned, docks become useless, and our splendid lake transports will rot at decaying wharves.

EXTENT OF INTERESTS AFFECTED BY FREE LIST.

Thus far I have confined my remarks to the probable effect upon only two of the industries, the products of which you propose to transfer to the free list. Were it possible to consider in detail the entire catalogue of one hundred and thirty-one articles with a view of ascertaining the extent of the interests involved and the probable effect of free trade on our domestic industries and labor, I am sure even the authors of this measure would hesitate to consummate their desolating work.

I beg leave to append to my remarks a statement from official sources of the capital invested, material used, labor employed, wages paid, and annual output, so far as attainable in the industries you have determined to transfer from the dutiable to the free list.

An examination of this table will disclose the magnitude of the interests you propose to jeopardize. We of the minority intend to resist to the last this wanton destruction of American interests. We believe in the development of all our industrial resources to the fullest possible extent and to that end would extend the same measure of protection to the producers of raw material as to the workers in the more advanced product.

We would not only be independent of foreigners for our manufactured goods, but for the raw material out of which they are fabricated. [Applause on the Republican side.] I can conceive of no policy more detrimental to American manufacturers and American labor than the abandonment of the production so far as possible of our own raw material. Such a policy would not only drive labor from the largest field of its employment, but it would dry up one of the most bountiful sources of national wealth and reduce our manufacturing industries to complete dependence on foreign nations for the supply of their raw material.

Such a result would be disastrous even to the interests it is proposed to promote, for when we have slaughtered our flocks, closed our mines, and wholly abandoned the production of our own raw material, the foreigner would take advantage of our helpless condition and impose upon us whatever burden his cupidity might suggest. We, therefore, would protect all interests, whether of the mine or the furnace, the field or the factory, to the end that all our people may receive profitable employment and the nation attain its highest possible development. [Applause.]

THE SOUTH.

And in this connection I can not refrain from expressing my amazement that you people of the South are so blind to your own interests as to cringe beneath the party lash and give this measure your support. A bountiful Providence has placed within your reach an inexhaustible supply of raw material which needs only to be utilized to give you an industrial impetus and development which would be the marvel of the age. Your mountains are bursting with iron and coal, your forests unexplored invite to new fields of unmeasured wealth, and how long will you be content to stumble over these natural gifts that you may do homage to a theory which, if it ever had any place in human affairs, belongs to other conditions and to another generation.

Let me implore you to turn your backs on the dead past and face the future. Place yourselves abreast with the spirit of the age by laying hold of the mighty possibilities within your grasp, and so aid in securing the highest prosperity of your people and the industrial advancement of our common country. [Applause.]

But not content with giving the freedom of our markets to the individual importer, you further provide that "All articles imported by the United States shall come in free of duty." In the act of 1890 this provision was eliminated from the law for the reason it was found to be a fruitful source of fraud on the revenues.

It was under such a provision as this that a single party was able to underbid and drive all others from the field of domestic competition and secure Government contracts for furnishing plate glass for public buildings and succeeded in defrauding the Government out of more than a million dollars of revenue. Under this provision the United States can purchase abroad and bring in free of duty clothing and equipments for its Army and Navy, all supplies for its hospital and Indian service, and everything which it may require in the vast range of its necessities. And so the American manufacturer is practically excluded from competing for any contract for supplies to be furnished his own Government.

By these means you propose to enlist the Government itself among the forces hostile to the development and maintenance of domestic manufactures. The Government is to be permitted to use the people's money to cripple and destroy the industries of its own citizens. It is no answer to say that for the Government to pay duties on its own imports is simply taking money out of the Treasury with one hand and returning it with the other, and therefore a mere matter of bookkeeping.

While this is true when the Government purchases abroad, yet it can avoid that idle ceremony by simply buying at home, and thereby sustain and promote its own industrial growth. No government ought to exact of the citizen what it is not willing to accept for itself. But this provision will undoubtedly be retained, because it is in harmony with the policy of free trade. It is only another weapon in the hands of an unfriendly Administration with which to cripple and destroy domestic industries.

But passing from the consideration of the free list to the dutiable schedules, we find here the same spirit of hostility manifested in every provision. There is not a schedule in which there are not some industries which will be imperiled by the passage of its bill—many will be utterly destroyed. On the other hand if there is any provision in this bill which will stimulate a single domestic industry or give increased employment to labor it has not been pointed out. The measure as a whole looks only to lessened industries and lower wages.

It ought to be entitled "A bill to lessen the revenue, destroy American industries, and pauperize American labor." The majority seem to have been actuated only by the desire to lower duties all along the line, regardless of the consequences to American industries or American labor. And in this connection it is noticeable that not a line in it is responsive to the public hearings had before the Committee on Ways and Means. You were admonished that our chemical industry "is one to be encouraged"—you have seriously depressed it.

You were advised by the workers in pottery that with lower duties they could not compete with the cheaper labor of Germany and England, and they implored you "for the sake of the hundreds of idle potters who are now walking the streets, for the sake of our wives and children, we implore you not to reduce the tariff"—you wholly disregarded their appeal. The workers in glass urged "a tariff sufficient to cover the difference in cost of labor and material between the United States and those competing foreign countries whose labor and material cost less"—you have denied their request.

The workers in metals from the crudest form to the most highly finished product besought you with united voice to continue protection and so aid them in securing good wages and maintaining the American standard of labor—you turned a deaf ear to their entreaties. The woolen and cotton manufacturers pointed out the disastrous consequences of the step you have taken in this bill—you declined to heed their admonitions.

The agriculturists asked to be protected in their flocks and the products of their farms. You slaughtered their interests without mercy. I repeat, therefore, the hearings might as well never have taken place so far as any seeming effect was produced on the majority of the committee. What secret advices you may have had in framing this bill will probably never be disclosed, but that they were from sources unfriendly to American interests can not, in the light of this measure, be seriously questioned or denied.

EFFECT OF LOWERING DUTIES.

As to the general effect on our industries should this measure be enacted into law there is no room for doubt. That it will stimulate importations to the detriment of American industries and American labor will not be controverted. Even existing rates, in many instances, have not been sufficient to restrain injurious foreign competition.

In spite of our efforts to foster and protect our pottery industries, importations have steadily increased from $4,954,813 in 1884 to $9,529,431 in 1893. If under the present rate of duty there was imported into this country in 1893 $9,529,431 worth of foreign pottery, what will be the volume of importations when your reduce duties from 55 and 60 per cent to 35 and 45 per cent, coupled with the exclusion from duties of the outside coverings? It is stated that 7,500 crates of English crockery are now awaiting the passage of this bill to be shipped into our market.

If $9,000,000 worth of pocket cutlery was imported into the United States last year under an ad valorem duty ranging from 63 to 95 per cent, who can calculate the value of importations under the proposed rate of 45 per cent? If $17,470,178 of chemical products were imported into this country in 1892, under a duty of 32 per cent, what will be the value of the importations under a duty of 25 per cent? If crockery, glassware, and articles in Schedule B came into this country to the amount of $22,329,305 in 1892, under a 50 per cent duty, what will be the importations under a duty of 33 per cent?

If the importations of metals in 1892 aggregated $38,288,459 worth under a 53 per cent, what will be the importations under a duty of 32 per cent? If $30,514,607 worth of agricultural products found a market in this country in 1892 under 32 per cent duty, what will be the volume of importations under a duty of 22 per cent? If in 1892 there came into this country of cotton manufactures $17,052,525 worth under a 55 per cent duty, what will be the importations under a 38 per cent duty? If $38,061,565 worth of flax, hemp, jute, and the articles enumerated in Schedule J came into this market in 1892 under a 44 per cent duty, what will be the importations under a 32 per cent duty? If $35,792,973 worth of wool and woolen manufactures came in 1892 under an average duty of 95 per cent, what will be the importations under a duty of 39 per cent?

It is beyond question that under such a radical reduction of rates importation will be enormously increased to the serious detriment of domestic industries and domestic labor.

There will be, too, no compensatory advantage to the Government, for it is susceptible of demonstration that in many instances the revenue derived under this bill, if the entire demand for the home consumption was supplied from abroad, would be less than under existing law.

I shall not pause to call attention to the many incongruities in this bill. The committee may be able to explain why pig iron is taxed, and cotton ties are free. Why the Northern farmer, with harvest labor at $2 a day, is allowed 20 per cent on his wheat, and the rice producer of the South, with 75 cents day labor, secures 71 per cent.

Why tallow, wool-grease, and degras are made free as tanners' materials, while the sumac of Virginia and North Carolina, used for the same purpose, is protected. Why the farmers' potatoes secure only 10 per cent consideration, while peanuts of Virginia grow in security behind a Chinese wall of 35 per cent. Why in many instances the duty on the finished article is less, or no more than on the articles entering into its manufacture. But I can not pursue this inquiry. There is one criticism I would not venture to make, but as it comes from one of your own party organs, the Troy Daily Times, I venture to ask the Clerk to read the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

[Troy Daily Times, December 16, 1893.]

There are many evidences that the subcommittee which brought forth the Wilson bill are tyros in tariff tinkering. Section 273 of the measure as first published reads as follows: "Collars and cuffs and shirts and all articles of wearing apparel of every description not specially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of linen, and linen hydraulic hose, 35 per cent ad valorem." The committee must have imagined that hydraulic hose related to some form of stockings designed to prevent wet feet. The attention of the tariff smashers is respectfully called to the fact that hydraulic hose is only another name for a certain kind of fire hose, not that of a variety of stockings.

[Troy Daily Times, December 18, 1893.]

The framers of the Wilson bill having classified hydraulic hose, which is used exclusively for extinguishing fires, among articles of wearing apparel, no doubt will remodel that extraordinary measure so as to include hydraulic rams and spinning-mules in the live-stock schedule.

[Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. BURROWS. I have only to say that the bill as a whole is as unscientific as it is un-American.

But the most startling feature connected with and running through the entire dutiable schedules is the general substitution of ad valorem for specific rates. Under existing law, duties are imposed wherever possible by the yard, pound, or quantity and not according to value. The object of this was to avoid undervaluations and insure an honest collection of the revenues. It was to protect not only the revenues of the Government but our domestic manufactures as well. In the committee s bill this policy is abandoned, and five hundred specific rates have been changed to ad valorem. If anything was needed in addition to lowered duties to complete the destruction of our protective system, it is supplied by the substitution of ad valorem for specific rates. Under such a policy, coupled with the reductions proposed, revenue and domestic industries will alike diminish, and the latter in many instances disappear.

The reason assigned for this step by the learned chairman of the committee in his advance pronunciamento announcing the completion of the committee's labors, is that specific duties "frequently conceal a rate of taxation too enormous to be submitted to if expressed in ad valorem terms," and then cites as an example "the duty of 8 cents on 100 pounds of salt, which amounts to 80 per cent on 'a common necessity of life.'" The consumer of salt does not realize the heavy tribute he is forced to pay of one-twelfth of a cent a pound on this "common necessity of life" and only appreciates the enormity of the outrage when advised it is over 80 per cent ad valorem. [Laughter.] Can it be possible that for the purpose of continuing this deception the committee retain a specific duty of 1¼ cents per pound on rice that the consumer of this "common necessity of life" may remain ignorant of the fact that he is bearing a burden of 71 per cent? But it is urged as a further objection to specific rates, that they operate unequally on the consumers of cheaper goods. But it must be remembered that on all the cheaper class of fabrics it is a matter of comparative indifference whether the rate is specific or ad valorem, as domestic competition has reduced the price of such articles in many cases to the consumer even below the duty itself.

Furthermore, specific duties serve to keep out of our markets cheap adulterated fabrics which are practically worthless to the purchaser, and insure a better grade of goods for the poor and rich alike. It is a matter of surprise that the chairman should have the courage to further state that "specific duties lead to greater frauds in administration, for counting and weighing at the custom-houses are done by the cheapest and most easily corrupted labor."

I may be permitted to say, in this connection, it will be a revelation to the laboring people of the country that in the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means they are as a class more easily corrupted than their more fortunate brethren. But when the chairman states that "specific duties lead to greater frauds in administration," he flies in the face of a current of authority which he can not successfully resist. The method of levying duties has been the subject of thorough and repeated investigation, and it is not too much to say that ad valorem duties are condemned by the almost unanimous verdict of those whose opinions are entitled to respectful consideration. I invoke the judgment of every Secretary of the Treasury investigating the subject, from Hamilton to Manning, in refutation of the position assumed by the majority.

In 1795 Secretary Hamilton reports to the House of Representatives that by existing laws about one-third of the duties was derived from articles rated ad valorem, and adds:

In other nations, experience has led to contract more and more the number of articles rated ad valorem, and, of course, to extend the number of those rated specifically; that is, according to weight, measure, or other rules of quantity. The reason of this is obvious: it is to guard against evasions, which infallibly happens in a greater or less degree when duties are high. It is needless to repeat that this will contribute as much to the interest of the fair trader as to that of the revenue.

Secretary Gallatin, reporting to the Senate in 1801, said:

In order to guard as far as possible against the value of goods being underrated in the invoices, it would be eligible to lay specific duties on all such articles now paying duties ad valorem as may be susceptible of that alteration.

Secretary Dallas, reporting to the House of Representatives in 1816, says:

Articles imported to a great amount should rather be charged with specific duties upon their weight and measure, in order to guard against evasions and frauds, than with ad valorem duties on their value.

Secretary Crawford, in 1817, said:

It is certainly prudent to diminish as far as practicable the list of articles paying ad valorem duties.

Secretary Meredith, in his report of December 3, 1849, says:

I propose a return to the system of specific duties on articles on which they can be conveniently laid. The effects of the present ad valorem system are twofold, viz, on the revenue and on our own productions. Experience has, I think, demonstrated that, looking exclusively to the revenue, a specific duty is more easily assessed, more favorable to commerce, more equal, and less exposed to frauds than any other system. This system obviates the difficulties and controversies which attend an appraisement of the foreign market value of each invoice, and it imposes an equal duty on equal quantities of the same commodity. Under the ad valorem system goods of the same kind and quality, and between which there can not be a difference in value in the same market at any given time, nevertheless may often pay different amounts of duty. Thus the hazards of trade are unnecessarily increased.

As the standard of value at every port must at last depend upon the average of the invoices that are passed there, every successful attempt at undervaluation renders more easy all that follow it. The consequences are, not only that the revenue suffers, that a certain sum is in effect annually given by the public among dishonest importers as a premium for their dishonesty, but that fair American importers may be gradually driven out of the business and their places supplied by unknown and uncrupulous foreign adventurers.

It will be remembered that this report of Secretary Meredith was made after the tariff of 1846 had been in operation three years—a tariff which eliminated all specific duties and embraced only ad valorems. And yet the committee has the hardihood to assert in its report—

Under the tariff from 1846 to 1861 this system was again tried and proved to be as successful in administration as it was just in principle.

The effect of ad valorem duties was made the subject of special inquiry by Secretary Meredith by calling upon custom officers throughout the United States to report the practical operation of ad valorem duties as provided for under the act of 1846. The report of the Secretary was based on the replies received from these official sources and they were practically unanimous in condemnation of the ad valorem system, both in its "administration" and in "principle."

The collector at New Orleans said, among other things:

There is no doubt that if the subject were referred to practical business men, to our merchants, and to those whose duties it is to administrate the law, the officers of the customs, it would be decided with singular unanimity that the ad valorem system is defective and that it works injuriously to public as well as to private interests.

The theory may be perfect, but its successful operation is impractical in consequence of universal and permanent objection—the fallibility of human judgment and the corruption of the human heart. The present system yielding protection when it is not wanted, and denying protection when it is most needed, is of all systems the most tantalizing, deceptive, and ruinous.

The customs official at the port of New York said:

The effect of abolishing specific duties has been to inundate our markets with merchandise of very inferior quality in addition to the incentive of low valuations. The effect produced upon the business of American merchants by the universal system of ad valorem duties has been a very largely increased ratio of importations by foreigners over Americans owing to the increased facilities for undervaluations of ad valorem duties and the low estimate of the solemnity of the custom-house oaths entertained among merchants in many foreign countries.

Not only officials, but leading business men everywhere throughout the country condemn the system of ad valorems with practical unanimity.

The following is taken from a statement of a business man in Boston:

In regard to the effect upon the business of American merchants engaged in the importations of foreign goods, the effect is to destroy the American importer and to turn the whole business of importing into the hands of foreigners. The experience of the past three years has shown that the business of importing has increased in the hands of foreigners immensely, and in the hands of American merchants has diminished very greatly, so that the whole business of the country under the present ad valorem system will soon fall into the hands of the fraudulent foreigners, and the American merchant will be thrown out of his honest and legitimate calling. The present tariff discriminates in favor of the foreigner, and again the American has been where there is no fraud.

These and many other citations might be made from the reports of officials and business men showing the universal condemnation of the ad valorem system. It is a notorious fact that under that system, embodied in the tariff of 1846, every American importer of wines in the city of New Orleans except two, in three years were completely driven out of business by foreigners. And it was officially declared that three-fourths of the business of importing in the city of New York under the tariff of 1846 and by the system of ad valorem rates had been turned over to foreigners. How the committee, in the face of this recorded evidence against the ad valorem system after three years of trial, could have the effrontery to declare that its operation had been "successful in administration as it was just in principle" is past human comprehension.

Secretary Bristow, in his annual report for 1876, said:

Another remedy, and the most effective which could be adopted for correcting the evils of the appraisement system, is the substitution, so far as practicable, of specific for ad valorem duties. The entire process of ascertaining duties would be more simple, certain, and safe. Opportunities for collusive undervaluation would be greatly lessened, and if errors were committed they could not, as to specific rates and amounts, be accounted for except upon the supposition of culpable negligence or actual fraud; whereas, in respect to ad valorem duties, an error of judgment may readily be assigned as a sufficient explanation.

Secretary Sherman, in his report to Congress for 1878, made the following suggestions:

As a rule, specific duties are to be preferred to either ad valorem or compound rates, and in any future revision of the tariff it is hoped that Congress will give preference to this system of imposing duties as far as practicable.

During the Administration of President Arthur steps were taken to ascertain through our consuls abroad and by means of special agents of the Treasury the extent of the frauds practiced on our revenues, and Secretary Folger in submitting his report of March 28, 1884, with accompanying documents, said:

These papers seem to furnish conclusive evidence of general and extensive undervaluation of imported merchandise subject to ad valorem duties. Besides the serious loss to the revenue consequent upon undervaluation as indicated in these reports, the practice has a demoralizing influence upon our trade with other countries. The lack of safe grounds against it offers a premium to dishonesty and makes it impossible for an honorable manufacturer or dealer in Europe to compete with his less conscientious rival for the American trade, and the honest American is precluded from importing lines of goods thus undervalued.

I can not refrain in this connection from making some quotations from these reports which form the basis of the Secretary's suggestions.

George C. Tichenor, one of the most accomplished and trustworthy special agents ever connected with the Treasury Department, said:

An English gentleman connected with one of the largest silk houses in the United Kingdom informed me that one of the most extensive and reputable manufacturers of silks in the Zurich district informed him that he consigned all his products for the American market to a commission house at New York, and that his consular invoices were uniformly undervalued, generally at 20 per cent. He justified his actions as follows: First. That the United States tariff was iniquitous and contrary to public policy and international comity. Second. He could not ship to the United States if he declared his goods at their true value. Third. It had become an established custom both at Zurich and Lyons. Fourth. He had to calculate upon some bad debts and losses in the United States.

I myself conversed with manufacturers who in effect admitted that the practice of undervaluing had become almost universal, and they expressed themselves as being extremely desirous that it should be broken up, since the competition in the practice was year by year becoming sharper, until it had become a race amongst them, in which the New York commission agents were the greatest winners. The undervaluation of silks at Zurich is not alone in invoicing the goods at prices below their true market value, but it is quite a common practice to make deductions also from such prices in the form of "allowances" for pretended defects or imperfections in the goods, under such designations as "imperfect," "defective," "light," "spotted," "soft," "streaked," "uneven," "wrinkled," "bad," "dirty," etc.

These reports abundantly show that the ingenuity and depravity alike of the Old World and our own have been ceaselessly employed in devising means and perfecting plans for defrauding our revenues and evading our customs laws. There is scarcely any kind or description of merchandise, subject to ad valorem duty, imported into this country from beyond the seas but has been or is being undervalued more or less.

I merely state a fact known to most merchants and tourists who have visited continental Europe of late years that the practice of undervaluing has become so common and universal there that even the shopkeepers and small tradespeople voluntarily tender American buyers, of small or large articles, invoices specially made for "the customs." Numerous instances of the kind came directly under my observation, and I was told that in most cases the purchasers accepted such invoices most cheerfully, and at times requested them.

There are in this country, largely at New York, an army of commission agents, who, in order to secure business, advise and urge foreign manufacturers to undervalue their consignments to them, as they make advances generally on such basis. In a large number of cases the goods are "declared for duty" at and below the bare cost of manufacture, and the commission agent, who can make such returns of sales as pleases him is enabled through dishonesty to profit both from the consignor and the revenues.

While the old ad valorem system appears most equitable and just, all experience has shown that under it the dishonest importers prosper, while the honest ones and the revenues suffer, and it has proved to be most expensive to the Government and people and vexatious and demoralizing to customs officers and employés.

I do not hesitate to say that I am entirely convinced that the only safe and sure remedy for undervaluation, in all its forms, is specific duties, and I believe that after careful consideration and preparation on the part of those charged with the revision of our tariff the same will be found applicable to most articles of import. Speaking of the French tariff, he says:

It is known that this system was substituted for the ad valorem system as a protective measure, and it is a significant fact that, pending the late protracted negotiations between the English and French Governments concerning an international commercial treaty, the French manufacturers, particularly those in the district of Roubaix, made public remonstrance against any concession in the direction of ad valorem duties, or departure from the specific system, as to textile fabrics or tissues, urging as a reason that English goods would come in undervalued as much, they said, as 30 per cent. I apprehend they reasoned from experience and practice.

Mr. Mason, our consul at Basle, under date of February 5, 1884, said:

The undervaluations and other irregularities by which the United States revenues have been, particularly since 1874, systematically defrauded, and the protective intention of the tariff laws to a greater or less degree neutralized, may be traced to various causes, among which are:

1. Excess of production in Europe and the consequent eagerness of manufacturers to pour into the American market everything that they find superfluous here. In the ribbon manufacture, for example, factories are often run at their full capacity during the dull season of the year, and the superfluous product thus produced is consigned to the United States at the bare cost of production or less, where, if it is admitted at the declared prices, it undersells and destroys the market for all similar goods imported by actual purchasers at real market values.

According to European theories America is the great national producer of food and raw materials and the great consumer of manufactured products. That the people of the United States should produce and export a large surplus of breadstuffs, cotton, meat, and petroleum is well enough (except as regards pork), but that they should insist upon manufacturing silks, watches, and other products of skilled labor at home and even hope to export their surplus of such manufactures, is regarded as an audacious violation of the natural laws of production and consumption. The United States duty laws become, therefore, to many European eyes, a false and unjustifiable barrier to international commerce, to evade which involves no violation of conscience or moral reproach.

There are exporters in Europe who would scorn a dishonest act toward an individual, who would redeem their unwritten promise with their last franc, but who sign their names to undervalued invoices for America without a twinge of conscience or regret unless the false declaration is subsequently detected and punished.

Mr. Mason then makes a series of suggestions to remedy these frauds upon our revenue, and the first suggestion is as follows:

The substitution, wherever possible, of specific for ad valorem duties.

Mr. Shaw, our consul at Manchester, in his report of February, 1884, said:

The chief difficulty which consular officers on one side of the line and appraising officers on the other have to contend with in arriving at the dutiable value is found in that large class of merchandise upon which ad valorem duties are levied.

As a rule, specific duties on all articles are easily and fairly collected. There is generally little chance of evading payment in these cases.

The great trouble—the ever-pressing struggle—arises over the long and varied list of articles upon which ad valorem duties are imposed. These cause consular and appraising officers and the Treasury authorities endless anxiety. The perplexities surrounding and incident to the fair collection of this class of duties are vast; and those who know about the constant and ingenious shifts resorted to by importers to evade payment of just dues on the one hand, and how extremely difficult it is to detect such devices and undervaluations on the other, are surprised that our duties are as well collected as they are at present.

But even the opinions of Secretary Manning seem to have been wholly overlooked or disregarded, who while Secretary of the Treasury addressed a series of twenty-four inquires to the customs officers of the United States, at all of the important ports of entry, among which was the following,

Would a change from ad valorem to specific rates be a benefit to the revenue and help to diminish a tendency to bribery, providing the existing quantity of duty is to be levied in the future, and could specific rates be applied to all textile fabrics?

The answer to these interrogatories are embraced in a volume of nearly a thousand pages, and are substantially unanimous in opposition to ad valorem and in favor of specific duties. I can not refrain from a single quotation from one of these replies from James D. Power, a special agent of the Treasury:

Ad valorem rates of duty afford temptations and opportunities for fraud which can not be guarded against, even by the most rigid rules and vigilant watchfulness. The assessment of values under this system is based upon expert knowledge of values, the most uncertain and arbitrary method that could be devised. Under the ad valorem system fraud has prospered and demoralized the importing trade, which has passed from the hands of American citizens into the control of men who have taken advantage of our high imprt duties to enrich themselves at the expense of the revenue and the ruined trade of the American wholesale firms.

Fraud of this nature is difficult to detect and more difficult still to establish. In the absence of documentary proof it resolves itself into a mere difference of opinion between experts; and the owner of the suspected goods can at all times procure experts who will maintain the correctness of his invoice prices, or he may select an easier and more convincing and efficacious line of defense by procuring affidavits from his buyer or partner abroad to the effect that the invoice cost was the actual price paid for the goods.

While fraud may be perpetrated under the system of specific rates by return of false weights and measures and by false classification, the officer lending himself to such fraud exposes himself to risks, sure in the end to lead to discovery, discharge from the service, and the prosecution under the law, because false weights and measures and false classifications can not, as in the case of undervaluation, be sheltered by the specious claim of mistaken judgment.

Secretary Manning, in making his report of December 7, 1885, based on these responses, said:

It is desirable that in revising and reducing rates of duty they should be made specific instead of ad valorem so far as the nature of the merchandise will admit. Theoretically considered, ad valorem are preferable to specific duties; but in practice, under such rates as we have had and must continue to have for years to come, the former are the too easy source of deception and inequality at the custom-house. Congress has it in its power to change from time to time, as may be advisable, specific rates so as to meet any permanent changes in values.

Secretary Manning summed up the whole matter as follows:

One hears it often said that if our ad valorem rates did not exceed 25 per cent or 30 per cent, undervaluations and temptations to undervaluations would disappear; but the records of the Department for 1817, 1840, and 1857 do not uphold that conclusion. Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices, or by undervaluations, or by any other means, under an ad valorem system, will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestibly, they are even notoriously inherent in that system.

In view of this overwhelming testimony it is purile to contend in favor of the superiority of ad valorem over specific rates. Against the opinions of the more theorists of to-day, I interpose the substantial judgment of practical business men, experienced officials, and the practice of the most enlightened nations on the globe. In all continental nations excepting the Netherlands ad valorem tariffs have been substantially discarded. France, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Sweden and Norway, Russia, Switzerland, Belgium, Portugal, and Spain, as the result of long experience with both systems, have settled down to the collection of their custom revenues almost wholly on a specific basis. It is more than folly, therefore, to attempt to foist upon this country a system condemned by a century of our own history and the experience of the leading European nations.

It is not surprising, however, that the party of free trade in the United States should make this method of levying duties the leading feature of its policy. It is a fit accompaniment to this bill. It removes the last safeguard to American industries and strikes down the last hope for our protective system. If there was nothing else in this measure deserving public condemnation, this alone ought to be sufficient to insure its overwhelming defeat.

But the members of the majority seek to secure public approval for the destruction of specific duties by pluming themselves with a show of lessened ad valorems, hoping thereby to divert public attention and secure popular applause.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in commenting upon high ad valorems under existing law made an exhibit of two pieces of cloth, suited, as he declared, to the uses of our laboring people, upon which there was a duty of from 200 to 300 per cent. Through the courtesy of the gentleman I have those identical samples before me. Here they are. A laboring man would be ashamed to wear either. What are they? One is a plush with cotton back and warp, and a filling of mohair waste, while the other has the additional adornment of cows' hair. There is not an ounce of wool in either. We placed a high duty on this stuff for the very purpose of keeping it out of our market, and saving our laboring people from being imposed upon with these cheap fabrics. [Applause.] Having driven our workmen out of employment by your free-trade policy, you now offer them the consolation of lower ad valorems on clothing of cotton and cows' hair.

When commenting on high ad valorem on crockery, the gentleman omitted to state that a toilet set of twelve pieces, which in 1878 cost $13.25, can be had now for $4; that a tea set of fifty-six pieces, decorated, which cost in 1878 $11.75, costs now but $3, and that a decorated dinner set of one hundred and twenty-five pieces, which cost in 1878 $46.70, can now be secured, after fifteen years of high advalorems on crockery, for $13.

Let me say to the gentleman that the masses of the people, however, at this time are not specially enthusiastic over the prospects of lower ad valorems. Our workmen are not searching for low ad valorems, but for employment. Shivering by desolate hearths over the expiring embers of the last handful of coal, they are not solicitous about ad valorems, but fuel.

Starving families clutching for the last morsel of food, can not be lulled into forgetfulness of present misery by the announcement of lower ad valorems on the necessities of life. Tramping the streets, out of employment, receiving alms, lower ad valorems will not heal the wounded pride of the brave men who never before were dependent on public charity. The laboring people of this country ask not lower ad valorems, but work. They prefer high ad valorems, constant employment, and abundant wages, to low ad valorems, idleness, and want. [Applause.]

But why press this issue of free trade? It has been repeatedly tried in this country, and has always been with the same disastrous consequences. It was tested most fully under the old confederation, and the flood of foreign importations not only swept away our manufactures, but the very foundations of that government. It was resorted to again in 1816 and with the same disastrous consequences; again in 1832, and the recollection of the panic and desolation of 1837 is still within the memory of living men. We again entered on this destructive policy in 1846 and 1857, and it culminated in individual and national bankruptcy. Yet the committee extol the tariff of 1846 and 1857 and make the astounding declaration that "During a period of fifteen years of low tariff, from 1846 to 1861, there was a healthy and harmonious growth of agriculture and all the other great industries of the country." An army of living witnesses could be called to refute this assertion. The history of that period will not sustain that declaration. Under the operation of these tariffs, industries declined, public revenues fell off, labor was forced out of employment, and general disaster and ruin was visited upon our people. A single quotation from the New York Tribune of January 15, 1855, will serve to show the deplorable condition of the single city of New York.

Go and see thousands, men and women, boys and girls, old and young, black and white, of all nations, crowding and jostling each other, almost fighting for a first chance, acting more like hungry wolves than human beings, in a land of plenty, waiting until the food is ready for distribution. Such a scene may be seen every day between 11 and 2 o'clock around the corner of Orange and Chatham streets, where charity gives a dinner to the poor, and soup and bread to others to carry to their miserable families. The cry of hard times reaches us from every part of the country. The making of roads is stopped, factories are closed, and houses and ships are no longer being built.

Factory hands, road-makers, carpenters, bricklayers, and laborers are idle, and paralysis is rapidly embracing every pursuit in the country. The cause of all this stoppage of circulation is to be found in the steady outflow of gold to pay foreign laborers for the cloth, the shoes, the iron, and other things that could be produced by American labor, but which can not be so produced under our present revenue system.

It is an uncontrovertible fact that during a period of thirteen years, from 1848 to 1860, covering almost the entire era under the tariffs of 1846 and 1857, that the balance of trade against this country aggregated more than four hundred and twenty millions, and that exports of gold for the same period exceeded our imports by more than four hundred and thirty millions. And that while in 1850 our imported merchandise amounted to only one hundred and sixty-four millions, yet in 1857 it reached the enormous sum of three hundred and thirty-three millions. And though our imports increased, our public revenues declined. Our warehouses were full of goods which importers declined to take from bond either because they were unable to pay the duties or there was no demand for their consumption.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Howell Cobb, in his annual reports for 1857, 1858, and 1859, while extolling the system of free trade, of which he was a most pronounced advocate, nevertheless was asking to be clothed with power to borrow money to meet the expenses of the Government in a time of peace. And it is a notorious fact that not only was the Treasury depleted, but the public credit became so seriously impaired that the obligations of this Government was negotiated at a discount of 12 per cent. Millard Fillmore, in his third annual message to Congress, December 6, 1852, depicted the condition of the country under this low ad valorem system in no uncertain terms.

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is, the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

I submit, therefore, that the committee is not justified in its assertion that the tariffs of 1846 and 1857 brought a "healthy growth to all the industries of our country." It was precisely the reverse, and these warnings of history ought to be sufficient to deter you from the repetition of the folly.

On the contrary, the eras of protection in this country have always been periods of marked prosperity, and we never recovered from the disastrous consequences of the experiment of free trade at any time until protection was restored. The history of our country in 1824 and 1828, 1842 and 1862 fully sustains this assertion. The last thirty years of continuous protection stands out as the golden era of our national existence.

Take down the census report for 1860 and 1890 and mark the gigantic strides by which we have reached our industrial supremacy. In that period of thirty years, despite the ravages of war, our population rose from 31,443,321 to 62,622,250; our acreage, from 407,212,538 to 815,000,000; improved lands, from 162,110,000 to 400,000,000; engaged in agriculture, from 4,335,758 to 9,600,000; value of lands, fences, and buildings, from $6,645,045,007 to $13,110,031,384; improvements and machinery, from $246,118,141 to $550,000,000; live stock on farms, from $1,039,329,915 to $2,418,766,028; cereals, from 1,239,039,947 bushels to 3,209,742,000 bushels.

Capital invested in manfactures, from $1,009,855,715 to $4,600,000,000; value of production, $1,885,861,676 to $8,700,000,000; wages paid in manufactures, $378,878,916 to $2,000,000,000; accumulations in savings banks, from $149,277,554, or $4.75 per capita, to $1,524,844,500, or $24.35 per capita; railways, 28,920 miles to 163,597 miles; assets of these roads from $1,867,248,720 to $10,278,835,746; street railways from 403 miles to 5,783 miles; investment in roads and equipments, from $14,862,840 to $389,359,289; assessed valuation of real and personal property, from $12,084,560,005 to $24,651,585,465, while the real value of the nation's wealth rose rom $16,129,616,063 to $63,648,000,000.

Yet in the face of this magnificent triumph it is now proposed to call a halt in the industrial march and turn the column backward over the deserted and disastrous pathway leading to free trade. The command has already been given, and consternation has taken possession of all our people. The record of this single year's disasters stands without a parallel in the history of our country. Fifteen thousand five hundred and sixty business failures, seventy-three railways, aggregating 31,878 miles, and representing untold millions of property, gone into the hands of receivers and to bankruptcy. Our mines and factories are closed, smokeless chimneys stand like monuments above the graves of dead industries, while an army of the unemployed are tramping the streets begging for bread.

Bradstreet, in a recent publication after a careful enumeration of the unemployed throughout the country, states that there are "in New England 65,200 unemployed and 154,000 dependent; New York and New Jersey, 223,250 unemployed and 563,750 dependent; Pennsylvania, 151,500 unemployed and 449,200 dependent; Central Western States, 227,340 unemployed and 443,310 dependent; Northwestern States, 64,900 unemployed and 175,800 dependent; Pacific coast, 25,800 unemployed and 4,700 dependent; Southern States, 43,065 unemployed and 122,650 dependent; making a frightful aggregate of 801,885 people unemployed and 1,956,710 dependent."

Yet the half has not been told. The record of this year's industrial and individual suffering resulting from this proposed legislation will never be made up. It exceeds the possibilities of human calculation.

I implore you to abandon this suicidal policy. Have you not pursued it far enough to become convinced of its disastrous consequences? It is no longer an experiment—it has become a public crime. You have it within your power to instantly relieve this appalling situation. You have only to substitute for the pending measure a joint resolution declaratory of your purpose to maintain existing law in full force and effect during the continuance of this Administration, and business activity would instantly take the place of business depression. It would arrest the slaughter of our flocks, open our mines, relight the fires of our furnaces, unchain the wheels of our industries, start every spindle and loom; while whistles and factory bells would call the tramping starving millions back from enforced idleness to profitable employment and the American Republic would leap with a bound to its accustomed place in the van of industrial nations. [Prolonged applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remind our visiting friends in the galleries that such demonstrations are not allowable under the rules, and a repetition of them will warrant the Chair in having the galleries cleared. [Renewed applause.] The Sergeant-at-Arms will be directed to remove visitors from the galleries unless they cease their demonstrations.

A MEMBER. They vote, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire at this time to place in the RECORD some information which may be desired by the members, and which was obtained from the Department of State. On the 20th of May last I addressed some questions to the Department of State, and they were submitted to consuls in foreign countries. The information obtained in regard to the operation of the income tax in England, Prussia, Italy, Austria, and several of the German provinces I have felt it my duty to put in the RECORD, in order that those who are studying the question and preparing themselves on either side of it may have the advantage of the information collected by the Government. This information will appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning, except where it is contained in reports printed in foreign languages, and these reports will be left with the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee, where they can be consulted by members.

Questions submitted May 20, 1893, to Hon. Alvey A. Adee, Second Assistant Secretary of State, and by him submitted to the United States consuls in foreign countries where an income tax is collected.

First. How long has the income tax been collected?

Second. What rate is levied and what exemptions are allowed?

Third. Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?

Fourth. What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax; has the rate been increased or have the exemptions been changed? And what is meant by "income"?

Fifth. Is the tax assessed by an officer, or does the citizen make return under oath?

Sixth. What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?

Seventh. Does the tax grow in popularity, or is it becoming more distasteful; and if there is complaint, is it from those who pay or from those who escape the tax?

Eighth. Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of the general government?

Ninth. Give any other facts in connection with the tax or its methods of assessment and collection which will enable one to judge of its wisdom and its advantages and disadvantages.

ENGLAND.

The questions put by Mr. W. Q. Gresham in his letter to Mr. Henry White, of the United States embassy, have been answered categorically.

In dealing with the questions raised the board's twenty-eighth report (1885) has been adopted as a basis and it has been brought up to date—so far as figures are available.

That report incorporates more or less all the previous reports of the board of inland revenue since 1857, and may be considered a fair résumé of what has taken place since the income tax was first imposed.

The following publications are herewith forwarded, viz:

1. Twenty-eighth Report of the Board of Inland Revenue, 1885.
2. Pamphlet entitled "Some opinions on certain recently revived propositions suggested with a view to a more equal incidence of the income tax," by F. L. Robinson, esq., C. B., deputy chairman to the board.

This pamphlet contains references to all the important discussions in connection with the proposed "differential" and "graduated" systems, and will prove very valuable in connection with questions 7 and 9.

3. A collection of acts relating to the income tax.
4. Some of the forms used in the administration of the tax.

QUESTION 1.

First. How long has the income tax been collected?

A short historical statement is annexed, showing when the income tax was first imposed.

The act which first created a tax with reference to income was the 38 George III, cap. 16, in 1798.

The tax was continued until 1816, when it ceased.

It was subsequently reimposed in 1842, since which year it has continued in force.

The statement referred to has been taken from the twenty-eighth report of the Board of Inland Revenue, made in 1885, a copy of which report is herewith forwarded for the information of the United States Government.

INCOME TAX—SHORT HISTORICAL STATEMENT.

The origin of the tax dates from 1798.

In that year an act was introduced at the instance of Mr. Pitt, entitled "An act for granting to His Majesty an aid and contribution for the prosecution of the war." This act did not, in fact, impose a duty upon property, but imposed additional duties of assessed taxes, regulated by the amount of income which the person charged with assessed taxes possessed, provided such person possessed an income of £60 a year or upward. The produce of the tax for the first year under that system was £1,855,996.

In the year 1799, by the act of the 39 Geo. III, c. 13, the duties granted by the above-mentioned act of 1798 were repealed, and in lieu thereof a duty was imposed upon incomes at the rate of 10 per cent. By this act all persons were required to make returns of the whole of their income from whatsoever source the same was derived, exemption being granted to those whose incomes were under £60 a year, and reduced rates charged on incomes between that amount and £200 a year. The produce of the tax in the first year after this alteration was £6,046,024, or about a quarter of a million for every penny of the tax.

In 1803 the present system of charging incomes upon all property and profit at their first source was introduced, and the return of the whole income, previously required, was abandoned. By this act (43 Geo. III, c. 122) the various descriptions of income chargeable with duty were, for the first time, distributed under the several schedules A, B, C, D, and E, as at present. A poundage rate, varying from 3*d.* to 11*d.* in the pound, was imposed upon all incomes between £60 and £150 a year, and 5 per cent upon all incomes amounting to or exceeding the latter sum. The profits of farmers were assumed for the purposes of the act to be three-fourths of the annual value of the lands and tenements they occupied if the land were in England, and one-half in Scotland, instead of requiring from that class a return of their actual profits, as in the case of trades and professions generally. Exemption was confined to incomes of less than £60 a year, from whatever source arising. The principle of taxing income at its source is thus explained in some observations on the tax, published at the time under the authority of Government. "As the former duty was imposed on a general account of income from all sources, the present duty is imposed on each source, by itself, in the hands of the first possessor, at the same time permitting its diffusion through every natural channel in its course to the hands of the ultimate proprietor.

"Instead of the landlord and the various claimants upon him in succession, it looks to the occupier only. Instead of the creditor, it looks to the fund from which the debt is answered. In the place of a complicated account, collected from the various sources from which the income of an individual is derived, it applies to the source itself to answer for its increase. By these means its object is attained with more facility and certainty, and with less intricacy and disclosure, diminishing the occasions of evasion by the means of exaction; thus the charge is gradually diffused from the first possessor to the ultimate proprietor, the private transactions of life are protected from the public eye, and the revenue is more effectually guarded."

The produce of the tax under this system at the reduced rate of 5 per cent was almost equal to that of 1799, when the rate was 10 per cent.

Between the years 1803 and 1806, several acts were passed relating to the income tax, which made no alteration in the principle, but in the latter year by 46 Geo. III, cap. 65, the rate of duty was again increased to 10 per cent. The exemption on incomes from realized property under £60 a year (which before existed) was, with a few exceptions, repealed, entire exemption was limited to incomes under £50 a year in the whole, and a graduated scale imposed upon incomes between £50 and £150 a year, but limited to profits of trades, professions, and offices.

The following extract from the guide book, published by the tax office at that period, will explain the grounds for the alteration. It states "that the regulation in the former act by which exemption was granted on the whole of every person's income under £60 a year, which was intended to have a strict and limited operation, has been introductive of the greatest frauds upon the public. It is notorious that persons living in easy circumstances, nay, even in apparent affluence, have returned their income under £60, although their annual expenditure has been treble that sum, and to whom there was no ground for imputing extravagance. The income of whole parishes has been swept away by this fraud, such persons generally bringing their income below £60. Hence it is that the legislature found the necessity of confining the exemptions to £50, that their former returns may be made use of."

By this act of 1806 the dividends in the public funds, which had hitherto been returned by the recipients as a part of their income, were for the first time brought within the principle which charged income at its first source, provision being made that the bank should make the assessment and deduct the tax from the dividends, instead of a return for assessment being required from the proprietors of the stock. An exemption was, however, granted for that portion of the funds which was the bona fide property of foreigners resident abroad.

An allowance for the repairs of buildings, which before existed, was taken away by this act, and abatements, previously allowed to persons with a certain number of children, were likewise discontinued. The allowance for life assurance was confined to persons whose incomes were less than £150 a year.

In the year 1816 the income tax ceased. It was not revived until the year 1842, when it was reimposed by Sir Robert Peel's government, not as a war tax but for the purpose of repairing the deficiency which then occurred in the revenue to meet the expenditure of the country, and to enable the Government to make some reforms, with the view of benefiting the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom.

Sir Robert Peel's act followed the general principles laid down in that of 1806; the duty was imposed at the rate of 7*d.* in the pound, being £2 18*s.* 4*d.* per cent, and total exemption was granted to persons whose whole income was under £150 a year.

By the act of 1842 the duty on farmers was imposed on half the annual value of the lands and tenements occupied in England instead of three-fourths, and on about one-third in Scotland instead of one-half, as under the former act of 1806.

From that time till 1853 but little alteration was made in the law.

In 1853 Mr. Gladstone introduced an act by which the tax was reimposed for a period of seven years, with various alterations and modifications. By this act the original rate of duty of 7*d.* in the pound was continued for two years, 6*d.* in the pound was imposed for the next two years, and 5*d.* for the remaining period of three years, ending 5th April, 1860, when it was intended to cease altogether, and the duties under Schedule B were proportioned accordingly. The total exemption accorded to incomes under £150 was repealed and limited to incomes under £100. Incomes amounting to £100 and not amounting to £150 were not subjected to the full amount of tax payable on property and profits generally. The rate of duty on such incomes was fixed at 5*d.* in the pound annually for the whole period of seven years.

The additional amount thus brought into charge on incomes from £100 to £150 was in Great Britain £14,467,300, which at 5*d.* in the pound produced a revenue of £301,320.

Under this act the income tax was for the first time extended to Ireland. The profits of farmers in Ireland were estimated at the same rate as those in Scotland; that is to say, at about one-third of the annual value.

On the declaration of war with Russia, it was found necessary to double the income tax from the 5th April, 1854; and a further increase was afterwards imposed by the act 18 Vict., c. 20, from the 5th April, 1855, of 2*d.* in the pound on incomes of £150 a year or upwards; and of 1½*d.* in the pound on incomes amounting to £100 and not to £150 a year, making 1*s.* 4*d.* in the former case and 11½*d.* in the latter.

This is the highest point to which the tax has ever been raised since its reimposition in 1842.

The act which granted the duty of 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound declared that it should continue in force until the 6th April after the expiration of one year from the ratification of the treaty of peace. As this did not take place until the financial year 1856, the act did not expire until the 5th April, 1858. In 1857, however, the tax was reduced to 7*d.* in the pound.

The Russian war upset the calculations that had been made in 1853 as to the cessation of the income tax in 1860. Instead of being abolished in that year it was charged at the rate of 10*d.*

In February, 1861, a select committee was appointed by the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Hubbard, "to inquire into the present mode of assessing and collecting the income and property tax, and whether any mode of levying the same so as to render the tax more equitable can be adopted."

The committee reported as follows:

"The attention of your committee on the present occasion has been mainly directed to a scheme proposed by their chairman, and explained by him both in written memoranda and in oral evidence, the principal features of which appear to be as follows:

"First. A proposal to make net instead of gross income the basis of assessment to the tax; not ascertaining the net income by an account of actual outgoings, but assuming it by a deduction, founded on an average from certain classes of gross income.

"Second. A proposal to divide all incomes into two classes, of which the one should comprise incomes called spontaneous, and the other incomes called industrial; and to tax the former upon the full amount of the net income, and the latter upon two-thirds of that amount.

"Third. A proposal to distinguish in certain cases between the interest of invested capital and the repayment by installments of the invested capital itself, and to levy the tax upon the interest only, and not upon the repaid portions of capital.

"These three proposals are addressed to three complaints which are popularly made against the income tax in its present form, viz, that it taxes the owners of property in respect of income which they do not get; that it presses too hardly upon skill and industry as compared with property; and that it deals with capital, in certain cases, as if it were income, and taxes it accordingly.

"The proposals which your committee have had under consideration are framed upon the assumption that the complaints to which your committee have adverted are well founded, and they are contrived with much ingenuity with a view to meeting them.

"Your committee, however, after full consideration, have arrived at the conclusion that the plan proposed by their chairman does not afford a basis for a practicable and equitable readjustment of the income tax, and they feel so strongly the dangers and ill consequences, to be apprehended from an attempt to unsettle the present basis of the tax, without a clear perception of the mode in which it is to be reconstructed, that they are not prepared to offer to your honorable House any suggestions for its amendment.

"This tax having now been made the subject of investigation before two committees (a reference to a committee which had considered the question about ten years previously), and no proposal for its amendment having been found satisfactory, your committee are brought to the conclusion that the objections which are urged against it are objections to its nature and essence rather than to the particular shape which has been given to it.

"Your committee also feel that it would be unjust to make any alteration in the present incidence of the income tax without, at the same time, taking into consideration the pressure of other taxation upon the various interests of the country, some of it imposed by recent legislation, and in one case especially, that of the succession duty, to some extent by way of compensation.

To those who are desirous of pursuing the subject, we suggest a reference to Mr. Gladstone's financial statement of 1853.

In 1863, an important alteration was made in favor of the class of incomes termed by Mr. Gladstone "minor incomes," which were previously exempted when under £100 a year, and were taxed at less than the full rate when between £100 and £150.

The total exemption of incomes under £100 a year was continued, but in place of the lower rate on incomes between £100 and £150 an abatement of £60 was allowed in assessing all incomes of £100 and under £200 a year.

In laying his proposal before the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone stated that in his opinion "the sore place, above and beyond all others in the working of the income tax, is at the point where incomes range from £100 to £200 per annum," and he expressed his conviction that the effect of his plan, if adopted, would be "to mitigate in a remarkable degree the difficulties which are now felt in the application of the tax to the lower incomes, especially at the two critical points of £100 and £150 a year."

The allowance relieved from tax in the year 1863–'64 income amounted to about £10,000,000, and in the following year to upwards of £12,000,000, and it is believed that the produce of the tax was thus reduced by about £75,000 per penny.

In 1872, Mr. Lowe increased the abatement granted to the smaller incomes, and allowed £80 to be deducted from all incomes between £100 and £300. By so doing he afforded relief in the course of the two years following to nearly 130,000 persons, while the amount of income on which abatements could be granted was increased in the same time from about £18,000,000 to £34,000,000, and it is estimated that the produce of the tax was reduced by about £50,000 per penny.

The year 1874 is memorable in the history of the income tax, both on account of Mr. Gladstone's offer to repeal it altogether, and also from the fact that after the change of government which took place in that year the rate of the tax was reduced by Sir Stafford Northcote to 2*d.*, the lowest point which it has ever reached.

In 1876 Sir Stafford Northcote again extended the system of exemptions and abatements. The limit of total exemption was raised from £100 to £150, while an abatement of £120 was allowed on all incomes between £150 and £400 per annum, instead of the existing allowance of £80 on incomes under £300. Inasmuch as we have no means of ascertaining the numbers of persons who are totally exempt from income tax it is impossible to state the effect of these measures separately.

Sir Stafford Northcote estimated the combined loss at £130,000 per penny, but it is now believed that the loss, by raising the limit of total exemption from £100 to £150, did not much exceed £80,000 per penny.

Upon this assumption the total effect of the two reductions must have been much less than estimated, inasmuch as the claims for abatement on incomes under £400 in 1876–'77 was only £156,000 per penny, against £163,000 per penny claimed on incomes under £300 in 1875–'76; the reason being, of course, that the exemption of incomes under £150 reduced the claims for abatement on incomes under £400. Altogether we are inclined to put the net loss at from £50,000 to £60,000 per penny.

The net produce for each penny of the tax in 1892–'93 was £2,215,000 (about).

QUESTION 2.

Second. What rate is levied and what exemptions are allowed?

1. A list of the rates of income tax since 1842 is herewith annexed, together with the amount of duty charged and realized in each year since the reimposition of the tax, viz, 1842.

A statement is also furnished showing the net produce for each penny of tax.

2. EXEMPTIONS

Incomes under £150 are exempt.

Incomes under £400 are subject to an abatement of £120.

Premiums for life insurance are exempt. The amount must not exceed one-sixth of the total income.

There are other exemptions extending to charities, universities, friendly, industrial, and provident societies, hospitals, etc., details of which will be found in the collection of acts relating to the income tax forwarded herewith.

QUESTION 3.

Third. Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?

1. The tax is not graded except in so far as the exemption of income under £150 is concerned, and further in the case of the abatement of £120, which is allowed as regards incomes sub £400. See answer to Question 2 (2).

2. The total annual income from the tax will be found in the statement furnished in answer to Question 2 (1).

QUESTION 4.

Fourth. What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax; has the rate been increased or have the exemptions been changed? And what is meant by "income"?

1. See answer to Question 1.

2. See answer to Question 2 (1).

3. "Income" for the purposes of the income tax is defined as follows (16 and 17 Vict., c. 34):

II. For the purpose of classifying and distinguishing the several properties, profits, and gains for and in respect of which the said duties are by this act granted, and for the purposes of the provisions for assessing, raising, levying, and collecting such duties respectively, the said duties shall be deemed to be granted and made payable yearly for and in respect of the several properties, profits, and gain respectively described or comprised in the several schedules contained in this act, and marked respectively A, B, C, D, and E, and to be charged under such respective schedules; that is to say—

SCHEDULE A.

For and in respect of the property in all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages in the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual value thereof.

SCHEDULE B.

For and in respect of the occupation of all such lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages as aforesaid, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual value thereof.

SCHEDULE C.

For and in respect of all profits arising from interest, annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities payable to any person, body politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of any public revenue, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount thereof.

SCHEDULE D.

For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount of such profits and gains.

And for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amounts of profits and gains.

And for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this act, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount thereof.

SCHEDULE E.

For and in respect of every public office or employment of profit, and upon every annuity, pension, or stipend payable by Her Majesty or out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom, except annuities charged to the duties under the said Schedule C, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount thereof.

QUESTION 5.

Fifth. Is the tax assessed by an officer, or does the citizen make return under oath?

It is the duty of all persons, from whom returns are required, to furnish such returns to the local assessor, who is an officer of the district commissioners of taxes; but in the event of taxpayers electing to be assessed by the special commissioners, who are a separate body appointed by the Crown, then the returns are rendered to the surveyor of taxes, who is also an officer appointed by the Crown.

These returns are not under oath. If the commissioners consider the returns satisfactory then assessments are made in accordance therewith; if unsatisfactory, then assessments are made in such amounts as they may consider sufficient to cover liability.

In cases where returns are not furnished estimated assessments are made, but the persons neglecting to make such returns render themselves liable to penalties.

For a fuller account of the assessment and collection of the income tax see pages 76 to 79 of the Twenty-eighth Report on Inland Revenue sent herewith.

QUESTION 6.

Sixth. What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?

The penalties on persons neglecting or refusing to make returns are £20 and treble duty when imposed by the income-tax authorities; £50 when proceedings are taken in the high court of justice.

QUESTION 7.

Seventh. Does the tax grow in popularity, or is it becoming more distasteful; and if there is complaint, is it from those who pay or from those who escape the tax?

See answer to question 9.

QUESTION 8.

Eighth. Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of the general government?

The mode of assessment and collection of the income tax is described in the Twenty-eighth Report on Inland Revenue. (See pages 76 to 79.)

QUESTION 9.

Ninth. Give any other facts in connection with the tax or its methods of assessment and collection which will enable one to judge of its wisdom and its advantages or disadvantages?

[Extract from the Twenty-eighth Report on Inland Revenue, pages 84 and 85.]

It may appear remarkable that in spite of all its drawbacks, and the constant attacks to which it has been subjected, the income tax should have remained in force for more than fifty years without undergoing any serious alterations. The fact of its having done so, furnishes a strong reason for assuming that its present form is as good as or better than any other that could be devised, and this assumption appears to us to be strengthened by the following considerations:

The two main objections that have been raised against the income tax are its inquisitorial character, and the inequitable nature of its incidence.

As regards the second of these objections we have nothing substantial to add to the report of the committee of 1861, who declared their opinion "that it would be unjust to make any alteration in the present incidence of the income tax without at the same time taking into consideration the pressure of other taxation upon the various interests of the country, some of it imposed by recent legislation, and in one case especially, that of the succession duty, to some extent by way of compensation."

The most common complaint against the incidence of the income tax is that it falls as heavily on persons who earn their incomes by skill and labor as on those who derive their incomes from property. In order to weigh the gravity of this objection it is necessary to consider what other taxes are paid by the owners of property from which persons whose incomes are acquired by their own skill and labor are free.

Let us take the simple case of a person just appointed to an office with a salary of £600 per annum, and compare it with the case of a person just succeeding to £20,000 in consols, on which the annual interest is also £600.

In the course of thirty years, supposing no change to take place in their circumstances, what amounts will each pay to the State? The one will pay income tax only, and if we take the average rate of the tax at 6d. he will pay £15 a year, making in all £450. But the other will, at the very least, pay, on succeeding to his consols, probate duty at 3 per cent, that is £600, as well as income tax. The property owner, therefore, will contribute to the exchequer more than double the amount contributed by the officeholder. A comparison can not be made so simply when real instead of personal property is concerned, as the special taxes to which it is subject, namely, the house duty, land tax, and succession duty can not be calculated as accurately as the probate duty.

But this example is sufficient for our purpose, and makes it quite clear that in considering the burdens imposed by the income tax on incomes derived from realized and unrealized property, respectively, it must always be remembered that realized property is charged with other financial burdens than the income tax itself.

With regard to the inquisitorial character of the income tax, we may observe that under the present system the evil is reduced to a minimum. It is quite conceivable that in no case is the full amount of any person's income known, either by any local authorities or by our own officers, excepting the incomes of those who claim exemption or abatement, and who have to furnish particulars of their incomes from all sources in order to establish their claims. It is quite certain that in multitudes of cases the full amount of the incomes can not be known to any authority. A person who is assessed under Schedule D in respect of some business he carries on in London may have additional income derived from land elsewhere and taxed under Schedule A as well as investments in consols, which are charged under Schedule C. In each instance the tax is certain to be paid, but there are no means of, or object in ascertaining that it is in each instance paid by the same individual. Neither can the incomes of persons be discovered who have money invested in the shares of railway and other companies, which pay the income tax on their profits directly to the revenue, and then deduct it from the dividends they pay to their shareholders. No authority can tell the amount of any particular shareholder's holding, or in how many companies he may have money invested.

It will have been noticed in our opening remarks upon the income tax that, in the first place, the tax was regulated by the amount of the income of the taxpayer; but that, although it was imposed under these conditions by Mr. Pitt in 1798, it was entirely reconstituted in 1799, and again in 1803. In 1799 the tax was equalized on all incomes, with certain exemptions and abatements such as now exist, and a return of their total income was required from every person. In 1803 this return was abolished, and the present system of taxing incomes at their source was adopted.

A graduated income tax has, therefore, once been tried, and given up after the experience of one year only; while an income tax dependent on returns of their total incomes from whatever source derived, made by taxpayers, has also been tried, and, after an existence of four years, abandoned. That this should have been the case is not surprising if the enormous temptations to fraud, which a tax so levied must present, are considered, as well as the stringent and irritating measures of supervision by which alone fraud could be prevented, even supposing that any measures would suffice for its prevention.

The supervision employed between 1799 and 1803 certainly did not achieve its object, for the produce of the tax under the system established in 1799, when the charge was at the rate of 10 per cent, scarcely exceeded the produce of the tax under the system established in 1803, though the rate was reduced to 5 per cent.

At the present time it is not too much to say that under Schedules A, B, and E fraudulent evasion is very difficult; and that under Schedules C and D, in a large number of instances, no temptation to fraud exists, inasmuch as the tax is paid for the taxpayer instead of by himself; and that, in fact, successful frauds can scarcely now be perpetrated excepting when the assessments must depend either entirely or in part on the returns furnished by the persons concerned.

It is probably owing to these considerations that proposals which have been made from time to time for a graduated income tax have never been received with favor by anyone who has had practical experience of the working of the income tax acts. A graduated income tax could only be made dependent on personal returns of income and the doors would thus be widely reopened to fraud.

In conclusion we may point out that the income tax in its first shape lasted only one year and in its second shape for only four years, while in its third and present shape it lasted for thirteen years before its abolition in 1816, and has remained so now for more than fifty years since its reimposition in 1842. The contrast is striking, and the advantages of the present system could scarcely be more conclusively proved. If, however, additional proof were needed it might be found in the fact that the present system has met with the approval of every eminent statesman who, since the days of Mr. Pitt, has had to control the finances of the country.

[Extract from Bradstreets, May 13, 1893.]

One of the most interesting features of the recent budget speech of the British chancellor of the exchequer was the showing there made as to the growth of the income tax during recent years. In introducing the subject he said that the maintenance of the strength of this tax and the continual growth of its yield were simply marvelous, and that nobody who had studied the question could understand how, in all the vicissitudes of trade and apparent oscillation of property, the income tax was a source of constantly increased and increasing revenue. It had been shown, the chancellor said, by his predecessor, Mr. Goschen, that the yield of the income tax did not mainly depend on the principle of conspicuous trade or decline with its depression. In estimating the yield of the income tax for the fiscal year just ended Mr. Goschen calculated a fall of only £400,000 on a total of £13,800,000 in the preceding year, which was the highest point at which the yield of the income tax had ever stood. As a matter of fact the income tax yielded a total of £13,470,000, or £70,000 more than the estimate of Mr. Goschen, and £220,000 more than for the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. Goschen's estimate, his successor recalls, was received with scepticism by many people, who thought it impossible to believe that the yield of the tax would not fall off to a greater degree. In noticing the existence of this state of feeling at the time Mr. Goschen said: "If I am to judge simply by the statistical returns, by the gossip of the city, by complaints in Lancashire, or by the position in Yorkshire, and if I am to listen to the committee, or to be influenced by the general feeling, I might come to the conclusion that there would be a very large gap in the income-tax returns for the year." He then proceeded to show that while public attention was fixed on the great staple industries of the country—cotton, gold, iron—"there is a mighty trade going on, there is a wealth being rolled up—wealth of which no published statistics exist, but which is nevertheless accumulating and adding to the capital of the country." He pointed out that the profits of the cotton trade were less than the aggregate profits of the medical profession, and that the profits of the coal mines were still less than those of the lawyers. As has been shown, events bore out the substantial correctness of his estimate.

Sir William Harcourt, in discussing the question further, said:

"The growth of the income tax is one of the most remarkable features of our finance. In 1889, when it was reduced to 6*d.*, its yield was £12,700,000; in 1892, only three years later, it was £13,810,000, or an increase of £1,100,000; and even with the decline last year it is still £700,000 more than it was in 1889. I have had some remarkable figures on this subject taken out which give the yield for the penny for the last eight years on each of the several schedules separately, a far better test than taking it upon the whole. They are new figures, and they are very deserving of the attention of the House. They give accurately the real yield of the tax, and are not merely the exchequer receipts for the year, which vary very much. Now, sir, in the year 1886, that is the commencement of the last Parliament, the income tax yielded £1,900,000 for the penny, and in 1893, which is just concluded, it yielded £2,291,000 for the penny.

"It will surprise many people to learn that the produce of Schedule A, lands and houses, has actually risen from £670,000 for the penny in 1886 to £676,000 in 1893. As everybody will anticipate, it has fallen heavily upon agricultural land—it has fallen from £217,000 for the penny to £191,000; but it has risen upon houses from £452,000 to £484,000, so that taking the two together there is an actual rise upon Schedule A. Schedule B, the occupiers of land schedule, has, as might be expected, heavily fallen. It has fallen from £48,000 for the penny to £36,000. As to Schedule D, the profits of the trade companies, etc., the yield in 1886 was £968,000 for the penny, and in 1893, in spite of the ruin which is said to attend all trade and to have destroyed all profits, it is £1,208,000—the highest that it has ever been. Schedule E, which represents the growth of salaries, the salaries of public employés and the employés of companies, has a remarkable figure, too. In 1882, ten years ago, the yield of that schedule was £118,000 for the penny, and in 1893 it is £152,000. When Sir Robert Peel imposed the income tax in 1842 the yield was £770,000 for the penny; it is now three times as much, and it would have required in his time an income tax of 1*s.* 6*d.* in the £1 to raise a similar amount. I have laid these figures before the House because I think that even in times of depression, and apparently of what are called bad times, it is well that the House and the country should know what is the actual condition of things."

In reviewing these figures the chancellor of the exchequer said that the steady and vast growth in the produce of the income tax and of the probate duties constituted the most irrefragable evidence of the solid advance in wealth, both in the annual income and the accumulated capital of the nation, and formed a conclusive answer to those pessimists who assured the country that it was being ruined by a vicious commercial system. "It is true," he added, "that this trade or that trade, this industry or that industry may have its ups and downs, its adversity and prosperity, but there is a perpetual compensation in all directions; the small rivulets of increasing income from every source, and the accumulated savings of the country supply the deficiencies of the larger stream, and year after year more capital is invested, and therefore there is a larger income earned."

The chancellor of the exchequer, it may be remarked, shows his confidence in the staying qualities of the income tax by adopting for the current fiscal year the estimate made by Mr. Goschen last year, namely £13,400,000. Furthermore, in order to meet the deficit shown by the balance sheet for the current fiscal year, he proposes an increase of a penny in the pound in the income tax, viz, from 6*d.* to 7*d.* in the pound. It is estimated that a penny in the pound will yield £1,750,000 the first year, which will just cover the deficit, estimated at £1,574,000, and leave a slight margin for contingencies.

PRUSSIA.

As the Kingdom of Prussia so largely preponderates over its fellow members in the German Union in wealth, population, and other resources, Prussian legislation on income taxation would seem to merit paramount consideration, and in the subjoined report, embodied in the answers given to the series of questions submitted to this legation, attention has for this reason been given exclusively to the provisions of that legislation.

The first Prussian income tax law, sufficiently general and uniform in its application to deserve that name, was enacted May 1, 1851. Further legislation on this subject ensued in 1873, 1875, 1877, and 1883. Those laws, however, are no longer in force, a law adopted some two years since having replaced them. The purpose of this report being a practical one, it will suffice to state that the tendency of the legislation on this subject has been to simplify progressively this species of taxation, and make its operation more general and uniform; to increase the amount of income which is exempted as being necessary to the support of its owner; to tax small incomes less, great ones more; and to abolish in its application distinctions based on the source of the income, or on residence, trade, or profession. This tendency has resulted in the present income tax law, enacted June 24, 1891.

Legislation on this subject, in great part of very recent date, and enacted since and largely modelled upon the present Prussian law, exists in nearly all of the twenty-four states, which, together with Prussia, constitute the German Empire.

The Imperial Government imposes no income tax. The existing laws on this subject are the laws of the individual German states, and the revenues accruing from them belong to the individual states, the means needed to defray the expenses of the Imperial Government being derived mainly from customs, and, in case of need, contributions, called matricular contributions, from the individual states.

In Prussia the income tax law of June 24, 1891, together with the regulation respecting its execution of August 5, 1891, which will be found in inclosures 1*a* to 1*c*, constitute the law on this subject now in force.

The historical development of the income tax existing in Prussia will appear from a consideration of the following laws relating to the subject: the law of May 30, 1820 (Law Collection, page 140), respecting the introduction of a class and classified income tax; the law of May 25, 1873 (Law Collection, page 213), respecting the amendment of the law last above mentioned, and the income tax law of June 24, 1891.

In reply to the particular questions submitted the following answers are given:

I. ANSWER TO QUESTION 1.

"How long has the income tax been collected?"

It appears to have been collected in Prussia for about twenty years past.

II. ANSWER TO QUESTION 2.

"What rate is levied and what exemptions are allowed?"

The rate levied by the present income tax will appear in the provisions of section 17 of the law of June 24, 1891 (see following answer). The exemptions from the tax are stated in sections 3, 5, and 6 of that law, and are as follows:

EXEMPTIONS.

The following persons are exempt from income taxation:

a. 1. The members of the royal house and of the princely house of Hohenzollern.

2. The members of the former royal house of Hanover, and of the former princely houses of the Electorate of Hesse and the Duchy of Nassau.

3. The representatives of foreign powers accredited to the Emperor and King, and the plenipotentiaries to the Bundesrath of other states of the German Union, the officers assigned to them, as well as the persons, in so far as they are foreigners, who are in their service or in that of their officers.

4. Other persons who, in accordance with the principles of international law, or pursuant to particular agreements concluded with other states, are entitled to claim exemption from the income tax. The exemptions granted under Nos. 2 and 3 do not extend to certain income declared taxable by section 2 of this law; that is to say, to income consisting of salaries, pensions, etc., paid by the Prussian state treasury, etc. Nor do these exemptions extend to those cases in which the foreign states concerned do not accord reciprocity.

b. All incomes under 900 marks are exempt.

c. Incomes derived as follows are exempt:

1. Incomes from realty situated in other states of the German Union or in a German protectorate, or from industries conducted therein, as well as from salaries, pensions, and "waiting money" (money paid by the state to a person to whom a place is promised, until a vacancy occurs), accruing to German military persons and civil officials or to relatives entitled in case of death from the treasury of another state of the German Union.

2. Income accruing to foreigners liable to taxation pursuant to section 1, No. 3 of the law, from foreign realty or industrial pursuits, when such persons neither reside in Prussia nor sojourn there for business purposes.

3. The military income of noncommissioned officers and privates, as well as the military income of all persons in the standing army or navy, while they belong to a part of the army or navy which has been placed on a war footing.

4. That part of the military service income, exceeding the amount of salary which entitles to pension, of such state and imperial officials and officers as have their service domicile abroad. In so far as such persons may be required to pay corresponding direct taxes abroad, such excess also remains exempt.

5. Income consisting of increases of pensions and of additions on account of mutilations sustained which have been accorded to war invalids, pursuant to legal provisions, as well as salaries honoris causa connected with war decorations.

Reductions in rates are granted as follows;

For each member of a family who is under 14 years of age and is not liable to be independently assessed pursuant to section 11 (i. e., children who have income wholly independent of the parent and not subject to his control) a reduction is allowed of 50 marks in the taxable income, not exceeding 3,000 marks, of the head of the house; with a further provision that if there be three or more such members of a family, the reduction shall in any case amount to that represented by an entire rate-group (section 17).

In making an assessment it is permissible (section 19), in view of particular economic conditions affecting essentially the ability to pay of the person to be taxed, to make such allowance in his behalf, that in the case of a taxable income of not more than 9,500 marks, a maximum reduction to the extent of three of the rate-groups prescribed in section 17 may be granted. The circumstances to be considered in this connection are exceptional burdens arising from the support and education of children, the obligation to support helpless relatives, permanent sickness, indebtedness, and particular misfortunes.

III. ANSWER TO QUESTION 3.

"Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?"

GRADE OF TAX.

There are grades with a progressive percentage according to the height of the income on which tax is to be paid: less than 1 per cent is charged on incomes up to 1,200 marks; on incomes of 1,200 marks, 1; of 3,000 marks, 2; of 10,000 marks, 3; and of 100,000 marks, 4 per cent of the income.

RATE OF TAX.

The following schedule will show the gradually increasing rates levied, beginning with incomes of more than 900 marks, and ending with incomes of 100,000 marks, which latter pay the maximum rate of 4 per cent.

These are the tax-groups herein referred to:

Income of more than—	And up to (inclusive)—	Rate.	Income of more than—	And up to (inclusive)—	Rate.
Marks.	Marks.	Marks.	Marks.	Marks.	Marks.
900	1,050	6	3,900	4,200	92
1,050	1,200	9	4,200	4,500	101
1,200	1,350	12	4,500	5,000	118
1,350	1,500	16	5,000	5,500	132
1,500	1,650	21	5,500	6,000	146
1,650	1,800	26	6,000	6,500	160
1,800	2,100	31	6,500	7,000	173
2,100	2,400	36	7,000	7,500	192
2,400	2,700	44	7,500	8,000	212
2,700	3,000	52	8,000	8,500	232
3,000	3,300	60	8,500	9,000	252
3,300	3,600	70	9,000	9,500	276
3,600	3,900	80	9,500	10,500	300

The rate is increased as follows for the following incomes:

Incomes of more than—	Up to (inclusive)—	For each—	By—
Marks.	Marks.	Marks.	Marks.
10,500	30,500	1,000	30
30,500	52,000	1,500	60
52,000	78,000	2,000	80
78,000	100,000	2,000	100

For incomes of more than 100,000 marks up to (inclusive) 105,000 marks the tax is 4,000 marks, and increases for larger incomes by 200 marks for each additional 5,000 marks of income.

The annual revenue from the tax:

For the year 1892–'93, 124,842,848 marks, about $30,210,712; for the year 1893–'94, 123,172,858 marks, about $30,7.3,214.

These are, however, not the final amounts, but only those assessed in the first instance by the appropriate authorities, and reached, therefore, without consideration of increases or diminutions occurring in consequence of decisions on appeal or otherwise.

IV. ANSWER TO QUESTION 4.

"What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax? Has the rate increased, or have the exemptions been changed, and what is meant by 'income'?"

The tax rates prevailing under the law of June 24, 1891, are for smaller incomes lower and for larger incomes higher than those that prevailed previously. For instance, according to the law of 1873, incomes of 3,000 marks (about $750) or less were uniformly taxed with 3 per cent. Now the tax on them is 2 per cent. More and more from time to time have the smaller incomes been relieved from taxation. The law of 1851 taxed all incomes. The law of 1873 exempted all incomes up to 420 marks (about $105); the law of May 26, 1883 (Law collection, page 37), all up to 900 marks (about $225); and thus it stands under the law of June 24, 1891.

AS TO WHAT IS MEANT BY INCOME.

What is meant by taxable income is determined by section 7 of the law of June 24, 1891, which declares that all annual income accruing in money or money's worth from the following shall be regarded as taxable, viz:

1. Capital.
2. Real estate, leases, and rents, including the rent value of the house, or the part of the same, belonging to and occupied by the taxpayer himself.
3. Trade and commerce, including mining.
4. Occupations from which pecuniary profit may be derived, all rights (all "gettings" is the very comprehensive word used in the law) to receive periodical payments or profits from sources not mentioned above (i. e., premiums, royalties, annuities, or payments in the nature thereof), and all advantages of any kind from which profit is derivable, however they have come to or been acquired by the holder of the rights.

V. ANSWER TO QUESTION 5.

"Is the tax assessed by an officer or does the citizen make return under oath?"

With respect to the assessment of taxpayers, a distinction must be made between those having an income up to 3,000 marks (about $750), and those with an income exceeding that sum.

The latter are required to make each year a written declaration of the amount of their income, which declaration is to be verified by an assertion (not an oath) at the end of it that the statements are made according to the best of the declarant's knowledge and upon his conscience "nach bestem wissen und gewissen" (section 24 of the law). The tax is fixed on the basis of the statements contained in the declaration if considered satisfactory by the income-tax assessment commissions, of which one is constituted pursuant to the provisions of section 34 of the law, for each of the circuits of the Kingdom of Prussia. The assessment of taxpayers with incomes up to 3,000 marks (about $750) is made by primary assessment commissions, who act for one or more communities or landed estate districts (section 31). The estimates of these latter commissions are subject to the confirmation of the chairman of the income-tax assessment commission, who, if he proposes a change in the rate fixed, must submit the matter to the decision of the commission (section 36 of the law).

VI. ANSWER TO QUESTION 6.

"What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?"

The provisions respecting punishment for failure to make proper returns of income are contained in sections 66 and following of the law.

SEC. 66. Whoever, in the tax declaration, or when answering the questions put to him by the appropriate authority, or in order to secure relief under the law, knowingly makes false or insufficient statements regarding his taxable income, or regarding the income of those whom he represents which are calculated to secure a reduction of the tax, or withholds information regarding his taxable income, which, according to the regulations of this law, he is bound to make known, will be punished with from four to ten times the amount of the loss—in case a loss has been suffered by the state—otherwise with from four to ten times the amount of the annual tax of which it was intended to defraud the state, but [in this latter case] at least with a fine of 100 marks.

Instead of this punishment a penalty of from 20 to 100 marks shall be paid, if the circumstances indicate that the incorrect or incomplete statements, or the withholding of information regarding taxable income, were, though made or done wilfully, not made for the purpose of evading the payment of tax.

A person who has made an incorrect statement before the appropriate authority may escape punishment by disclosing the error and paying (within the time limited by law) the tax; providing such disclosure and payment be made before a charge has been made or an investigation begun on the subject.

SEC. 67. The collection of tax fraudulently withheld takes place in addition to and independently of that of the penalty.

The liability to pay tax fraudulently withheld is barred by limitation in ten years and passes to the heirs but not beyond the amount of their inheritance, and when it devolves on them it is barred by limitation in five years. The period of limitation in the case of the taxpayer begins with the end of the tax-year in which the fraud takes place.

The fixing of the amount of the tax to be paid in case of fraud rests with the government [the chief local administrative authority] from whose decision appeal lies only to the minister of finance.

SEC. 68. Whoever refuses to give the information demanded of him, pursuant to section 22, or upon insufficient grounds of excuse does not within the period limited furnish the same at all, or furnishing the same furnishes it incompletely or incorrectly, is punishable with a fine of 300 marks.

Whoever does not, in accordance with the duty prescribed by section 61, in due season give notice of his arrival and departure [in matter of residence] is to pay a penalty of 20 marks.

SEC. 69. The officials who participate in the assessment of tax, and the members of the commissions, are liable to a penal fine up to 1,500 marks (about $375), or to imprisonment for three months, if they, without authorization, make known the circumstances as to the earnings, property, or income of the taxpayer, and especially the contents of a tax declaration, or of the proceedings which have taken place in relation to the same.

Prosecution in such case takes place, however, only at the instance of the government [the chief local administrative authority] or the taxpayer.

SEC. 70. The pecuniary penalties, to be determined according to sections 66, 68, and 69, are, if they can not be collected, to be changed into imprisonment according to the existing regulations of the penal code of the German Empire. (Sections 28 and 29.)

The investigation and decision respecting the punishable acts designated in sections 66 and 68 rest with the court, unless the accused, within a specified period of which he is to have notice, voluntarily pays the fine in the amount primarily fixed by the Government together with the costs that have arisen in consequence of the procedure taken against him.

The chief governmental administrative officers are empowered to impose a milder punishment than is prescribed in section 66.

If the accused has no residence in Prussia, judicial proceedings take place, without the provisional determination of the punishment by the Government. This is also the case where the Government for other reasons declares that it will for the present desist from fixing the punishment, or where the accused waives such previous provisional determination.

The decision regarding tax fraudulently withheld rests in all cases with the administrative authorities, but proceedings for violation of the provisions respecting the duty of secrecy (section 69) are to be in the courts.

VII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 7.

"Does the tax grow in popularity or is it becoming more distasteful; and if there is complaint is it from those who pay or those who escape the tax?"

It will have been seen that taxation of incomes has existed in Prussia for more than forty years. It is one of various taxes, and the result of my observation on the subject is that the fact that it is a tax upon incomes does not of itself constitute in the popular mind an objection to it. In other words, it does not appear that objection is made that in order to raise the money which is obtained by that tax, other things should be taxed instead of incomes, and that incomes should not be taxed.

As will have been seen, the burdens of income taxation in Prussia fal most heavily on those who are best able to bear them. The law exempts all incomes under 900 marks (about $225), and the taxation is graded. While an income of 1,200 marks (about $300) is taxed at the rate of 1 per cent, one of 3,000 marks (about $750) is taxed at 2, one of 10,000 (about $2,500) at 3, and one of 100,000 marks (about $25,000) at 4 per cent. Favor is shown in the law to those who have to bear exceptional burdens arising from support and education of children, the obligation to support helpless relations, permanent illness, indebtedness, and particular misfortunes. It may be remarked that the taxpayer is not required to make oath to the statement which he must make for taxation of his income, but it is to be made under his solemn declarations or asseveration on "knowledge and conscience."

VIII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 8.

"Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of of the general government?"

The collection of the income tax is, as regards incomes up to 3,000 marks, in several provinces confided to the communities, who receive for this service 2 per cent of the income actually collected (section 73, subdivision 3 of the law). Otherwise this duty devolves upon the royal treasury officers, of which one exists in each circuit of Prussia. These officers are so organized that there is but one state officer in each, the rent-master, who, upon his own responsibility, may employ private assistants.

BAVARIA.

I. ANSWER TO QUESTION 1.

"How long has the income tax been collected?"

An income tax has existed in Bavaria since October 1, 1848.

According to the laws of June 4, 1848 (Bavarian Law-sheet, page 154), and of July 11, 1850 (Bavarian Law-sheet, page 205), income tax was to be paid on all net incomes, whether reached by some of the other species of taxation or not, and whether consisting of money, or money's worth, or of "selbstbenutzung" [the value of the use or occupation of a thing, or property by the owner of it himself], whether permanent or temporary, and whether dependent on legal obligation or the free will of other persons. This income tax remained in force until 1856.

From the 1st of October, 1856, in pursuance of the law relating to income tax of May 31 of that year—the general income tax previously existing was replaced by a particular income tax, intended to reach income not reached by any direct tax; that is to say, income derived from the following sources: from earnings acquired in liberal occupations (not carried on in a regular business like way), from scientific and artistic occupations; from salaries and service emoluments; retired pay and contributions to support; from jointures, stipends granted to prebendaries; receipts arising from peasant-holdings consisting of cottages without land, annuities and the like. This particular income tax has in respect to its underlying principles been retained in the income-tax law now in force, of May 19, 1881 (Law-sheet No. 31, page 441), which, together with the regulation concerning its execution of July 29, 1881 (Law-sheet No. 46), is herewith transmitted—inclosures 2a and 2b. Details respecting the subject of this income tax will be found in articles 1 and 2 of this law.

II AND III. ANSWER TO QUESTIONS 2 AND 3.

(2) "What rate is levied and what exemptions are allowed?" and

(3) "Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?"

The rates levied are treated of in three groups, and within these groups are graded in the manner stated in article 5 of the law. The rate is in the first group one-third of 1 per cent, in the second it increases from about four-tenths of 1 per cent to a little more than 1 per cent, while in the third the rate up to an income of 1,020 marks, amounts to one-third of 1 per cent, and even in the highest grades remains something less than 1 per cent. According to a provision of a law relating to finance, an additional tax of 6 pfennig on the mark in the case of Groups I and II, and of 11 pfennigs on the mark in that of Group III is levied. The annual yield of the income tax for the year 1892 was 2,110,038 marks. The exemptions from the income tax are enumerated in articles 12, 13, and 14 of the law of May 19, 1881.

IV. ANSWER TO QUESTION 4.

"What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax? Has the rate increased or have the exemptions been changed, and what is meant by income?"

The important change which has taken place in the taxation system of Bavaria since an income tax has existed there has been discussed already in the answer to question 1. This also answers the question "What is meant by income?" in the sense of the Bavarian income-tax law now in force. The changes in the tax rates since the law of May 31, 1856, consist solely in the conversion of their expression in florins into the present money of the Empire. The addition imposed by a finance law (hereinbefore referred to) was, however, increased from the year 1882 by 1 per cent.

As regards the exemptions enumerated in the income-tax law of May 19, 1881, the same were contained in the law of 1856 in article 12, number 1 and numbers 3 to 8, but were expressed in a somewhat different form. In this connection it should be added that the amounts stated in number 6 at 500 marks were, in the law of 1856, put at 200 florins each, and in the before-mentioned law of February 25, 1880, at 350 marks each. The exemption under number 2 of article 12 was newly introduced in the text of the law of 1881.

A similar exemption had, however, been in fact conceded as early as 1856. Finally, the exemptions under articles 13 and 14 of the law of 1881 are also new.

V. ANSWER TO QUESTION 5.

"Is the tax assessed by an officer or does the citizen make return under oath?"

Pursuant to the income-tax law of May 19, 1881, all persons from whom income tax is due are required to make a declaration respecting their taxable income. The declaration is not under oath. After the receipt of the declaration the amount of taxable income is fixed by a tax committee, in which the local revenue officer is entitled to take part in discussion, but not to vote.

VI. ANSWER TO QUESTION 6.

"What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?"

A failure to make the required declaration is punishable by a fine up to 50 marks (article 66, number 3, of the law). Incorrect statements, knowingly made, which are calculated to lead to a loss of tax to the Government are, by articles 65 and 66 of the law, made punishable with a fine of from five to ten times the amount of the annual tax of which it was intended to defraud the Government.

VII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 7.

"Does the tax grow in popularity, or is it becoming more distasteful, and if there is complaint is it from those who pay or those who escape the tax?"

This question has already been answered in the first reply to the instructions to which this is a further response.

VIII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 8.

"Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of the general government?"

The collection of the income tax takes place in the seven governmental districts of the Kingdom situated on the right side of the Rhine by Government officials (rent officers). In the palatinate the collection is by the local communal authorities.

WURTEMBERG.

In the Kingdom of Wurtemberg there is no general income-tax law embracing incomes. The Wurtemberg income tax reaches income only from appanages, capital sums, and securities on the one hand and from salaries and professional practice on the other. In addition there are particular direct taxes on realty, buildings, and industries.

An official publication of the law of September 19, 1852, relating to the taxation of income from capital sums, securities, and professional practice, edited with application to the most recent conditions, accompanies this report as inclosure 4.

In replying to the questions propounded, the law itself is referred to where particular items are best answered in that way.

I. ANSWER TO QUESTION 1.

"How long has the income tax been collected?"

Direct taxation of income from capital sums and securities, salaries, and pensions was introduced in the year 1820 as an auxiliary to the ordinary direct taxation of realty, buildings, and industries. Something (but it was but little) had been done before in the way of this kind of taxation. The law of September 19, 1852, already referred to, is in force to-day.

II. ANSWER TO QUESTION 2.

"What rate is levied, and what exemptions are allowed?"

At present the tax rate is 4.4 per cent of the taxable annual amount (see answer to question 3); from the 1st of April, 1894, it will be 4.8 per cent. The exemptions allowed are enumerated in article 3 of the law.

III. ANSWER TO QUESTION 3.

"Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?"

The tax on income from capital sums and securities is not graded; the entire annual income is regarded as the taxable annual amount. On the other hand, the tax on income from salaries and professional practice is graded, as appears in article 5 of the law.

The yield of the tax on income from capital sums and securities for the year 1891-'92, in round numbers, was 4,000,000 marks, and on income from salaries and professional practice 1,400,000 marks.

The yield is gradually increasing.

IV. ANSWER TO QUESTION 4.

"What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax; has the rate increased or have the exemptions been changed, and what is meant by income?"

The law of 1852 has not been changed in important respects. The various changes affecting minor points are stated in the inclosed "Manual Edition."

The tax rate was originally for income from salaries and professional practice, 6 per cent; for income from capital sums and securities, 5 per cent.

From the 1st of July, 1858, it was uniformly 4 per cent; from the 1st of July, 1868, 4.4 per cent; from the 1st of July, 1871, 4.8 per cent; from the 1st of April, 1880, 4.4 per cent of the taxable annual amount, and from the 1st of April, 1894, it will be 4.8 per cent again.

As regards changes in the exemptions, Article 3 of the law, as published in the accompanying Manual Edition, is again referred to.

V. ANSWER TO QUESTION 5.

"Is the tax assessed by an officer, or does the citizen make return under oath?"

The tax is based on declarations by those from whom tax is due, which are not under oath.

VI. ANSWER TO QUESTION 6.

"What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?"

Improper returns of income are punishable with ten times the amount of the sum withheld. Article 11 and following of the law.

VII. Question 7, as to the popularity of the tax, has been answered in the reply to the instructions to which this is a further reply.

VIII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 8.

"Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of the general government?"

The tax is collected by persons in the service of the state—the so-called local tax officials appointed for each community.

BADEN.

I. ANSWER TO QUESTION 1.

"How long has the income tax been collected?"

In the Grand Duchy of Baden an income tax has been levied since the 1st of January, 1886. The tax is based on the law of June 24, 1884 (inclosure 5a).

II. ANSWER TO QUESTION 2.

"What rate is levied, and what exemptions are allowed?"

Since the 1st of January, 1892, the tax rate levied is 2 per cent.

The exemptions are stated in article 6 of the law. The most important one is that which frees from the tax all incomes under 500 marks.

III. ANSWER TO QUESTION 3.

"Is the tax graded, and what is the total income from the tax?"

The manner in which the tax is graded is shown in article 13 of the law.

The entire net yield of the income tax for the year 1891 was 5,723,754 marks. For the year 1892-'93 (for which year the tax rate has been reduced from 2½ to 2 per cent) the net yield is estimated at 4,580,123 marks.

IV. ANSWER TO QUESTION 4.

"What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax; has the rate increased or have the exemptions been changed? And what is meant by income?"

Since the introduction of the income tax, but one change has taken place, viz, that effected by the law of the 6th of May, 1892 (inclosure 5b), and the "regulation" issued to carry it out (inclosure 5c). By this amendment cooperative societies doing an open business, registered associations which conduct a business resembling that of banking, and insurance companies based on mutuality and employing agents, are to be exempt from income tax after the 1st of January, 1894.

The tax rate was from the 1st of January, 1886, until the 31st of December, 1891, 2½ per cent. From the 1st of January, 1892, it has been reduced to 2 per cent.

No changes have taken place in the exemptions stated in article 6 of the law.

What is meant by income is defined in articles 2 to 4 of the law and in sections 1 to 11 of the auxiliary regulation of the ministry of finance of the 17th of February, 1885 (inclosure 5).

V. ANSWER TO QUESTION 5.

"Is the tax assessed by an officer or does the citizen make return under oath?"

The person owing tax is required to make a declaration (not under oath). See Articles 12 and 14 to 19 of the law. On the basis of and after examination of such declaration it devolves upon the board of estimate to fix the amount of the taxable income.

In each community the board of estimate consists of the burgomaster and, according to the size of the community, of from three to twelve other members, who are appointed by the district councillor, a local administrative officer, from the number of persons in the place who are assessed for income or other direct taxation. The taxpayer has the right to appeal from the decision of the board of estimate to the superior tax authorities, and, as against the decision of the latter, to the court of administration.

VI. ANSWER TO QUESTION 6.

"What punishment is provided for a failure to make a proper return of income?"

Whoever fails to make a declaration of the tax he owes or makes an incorrect one is punishable by a fine of eight times the amount of the loss the Government would have sustained. (See articles 26 and 27 of the law.)

VII. Question 7, as to the popularity of the tax, is answered in the first reply of these interrogatories.

VIII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 8.

"Is the tax collected through local authorities or by a representative of the general government?"

The tax is collected by state officers.

BREMEN.

I. ANSWER TO QUESTION 1.

"How long has the income tax been collected?"

An income tax has been levied since the year 1818.

II. ANSWER TO QUESTION 2.

"What rate is levied and what exemptions are allowed?"

The rate levied has been for incomes taxed at a specific rate of percentage as follows for the following periods:

From 1848 to 1871, 1 per cent; for 1872, 1½ per cent; for 1873 and 1874, 2 per cent; for 1875, 2 per cent; for 1876, 3 per cent; for 1877, 4½ per cent; for 1878, 3 per cent; from 1879 to 1892, 4 per cent.

For the year 1893 the rate is 4 per cent with an addition for incomes of over 6,000 marks—as shown by the accompanying law of the 14th of March, 1893 (inclosure 11a). See also answer to question 3.

The exemptions allowed are stated in section 3 of the law of the 17th of December, 1874 (inclosure 11b).

III. ANSWER TO QUESTION 3.

"Is the tax graded, and what is the total annual income from the tax?"

Compare section 4 of the law of the 17th of December, 1874, and the scale in inclosure A, accompanying the same, which scale has been changed by the law of the 16th of November, 1880. The scale of the last mentioned law is still in force.

The yield of the tax varies considerably. It was as follows for the last ten years:

	Marks.		Marks.
For 1883	2,618,540	For 1888-'89	2,427,663
For 1884	2,501,474	For 1889-'90	2,844,315
For 1885-'86	2,237,977	For 1890-'91	3,291,396
For 1886-'87	2,164,623	For 1891-'92	3,633,794
For 1887-'88	2,186,490	For 1892-'93	3,225,093

IV. ANSWER TO QUESTION 4.

"What important changes have been made during the existence of the tax; has the rate increased or have the exemptions been changed, and what is meant by 'income'?"

A material change in the manner of levying the tax was introduced by the law of the 25th of October, 1874 (inclosure 11d). See answer to question 3. As regards changes in tax rates, see answer to question 2. Up to the year 1874 the rate was from incomes of from 250 up to 400 reichsthale s. gold, 1 reichsthaler (1 reichsthaler = 3 marks 3½ pfennigs); for incomes of from 400 to 500 reichsthalers, gold, 2½ reichsthalers, and for incomes of 500 reichsthalers or more, 1 per cent. In 1872, and again in 1873, the rate was changed somewhat, especially the amounts to which a specific rate of percentage applied. In 1874 the scale appended to the law of the 17th of December, 1874, and in 1881, that now in force pursuant to the law of the 16th of November, 1880 (inclosure 11c), were introduced. The following exemptions existed: Until 1872, incomes under 250 reichsthalers, gold (about 830 marks); in 1873 and 1874 incomes under 750 marks, and since 1875 (law of 1874), incomes under 600 marks; otherwise exemptions have not been materially changed.

What is meant by taxable income, is told in section 5 of the law and its inclosure B; see also amendments thereto of 1880 and 1885 (inclosure 11c, page 119; inclosure 11e, and inclosure 11f).

V. ANSWER TO QUESTION 5.

"Is the tax assessed by an officer, or does the citizen make return under oath?"

Until 1874 the tax was paid for incomes not taxed at a specific rate of percentage, but at a fixed sum, publicly, as was also the tax for incomes taxable at a specific rate of percentage. Whatever sum in excess was due the taxpayer was required, not on oath, but upon the faith of his oath as a citizen (Bürgereid) to cast (no control whatever in regard to the amount cast in being exercised) into a chest, the so-called castle-chest (schloss-kiste). Whoever, for instance, had an income of 100,000 reichsthalers, gold, was required (until 1871) to pay 5 reichsthalers publicly, and to throw (covered up enveloped) into the box 995 reichsthalers; i. e., as to the amount so thrown into the chest, it was put in secretly; and, indeed, there was no guaranty that the true or any amount was put in. This system was replaced in the year 1875 by that introduced by the law of the 17th of December, 1874 (inclosure 11*b*), which is based on the declaration (subject to official examination and determination) of the taxpayer. It may be incidentally remarked in this place that a comparison of the yield of the tax under the present system with the yield under the former system, without such examination and determination, shows that the returns made under the former system were essentially correct.

Details respecting the new system will be found in sections 8 to 10 of the law of the 17th of December, 1874 (see also amendment of the 5th of January (inclosure 11*g*) as also the law of the 25th of October, 1874 (inclosure 11*d*) declaring what authorities shall be competent to collect the income tax (see also amendments of the 24th of January, 1886, and of the 26th of March, 1892, (inclosures 11*h* and 11*i*). From the above-mentioned laws it will be perceived it may be added, that the "assessment board" consists of 4 members of the Bremen senate and of 12 members of the popular representative body of that city.

VI. ANSWER TO QUESTION 6.

"What punishment is provided for a failure to make proper return of income?"

See sections 11 and 12 of the law.

VIII. ANSWER TO QUESTION 8.

"Is the tax collected through local authorities, or by representatives of the general government?"

The tax is collected by state authorities, viz, by the general tax office in Bremen, and subordinate tax offices.

AUSTRIA.

In 1892 the Austrian Government collected about $10,000,000 from an income tax.

In volume 28 of Consular Reports (1883) the consul-general at Vienna makes the following report in regard to the income tax (his report was submitted to this Government April 30, 1887):

"An income tax has existed in Austria since the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was repealed in 1829 and reënacted in 1849.

"This tax is divided into three classes:

"First class. Under the first class the following income is taxed: (a) the income derived from all those trades and occupations which are subject to a license tax; (b) the income of mining and smelting establishments; (c) the profits made by the tenants of agricultural lands and of tenants of tolls and consumption tax districts.

"Second class. (a) Income from services rendered or labor performed in occupations not subject to a license tax; (b) annual income or dividends paid by life insurance or other companies or societies.

"Under this class are included the salaries of public and private officers and servants; pensions, donations, and other pecuniary assistance received by public functionaries, servants, and officers retired from active service; pensions of the widows and children of civil and military officers; also the pecuniary donations made out of the public funds, either national or local, to cloisters or theological orders; also the incomes of authors, artists, physicians, and veterinary surgeons, midwives, and private teachers (the latter only in towns of less than 4,000 souls); the income of university professors from lecture and examination fees. Servants are only taxed under this class if their total income exceeds 600 florins ($236.16) per annum.

"Third class. Under this class are embraced: Interest from loans and other outstanding demands and claims; interest from invested capital; income from savings banks and life-insurance companies. Benevolent and mutual assistance corporations and stipends are also included in this class.

"Exemptions from income tax.—The pay of officers and soldiers in active service, also that of reserve officers; the income of cloisters devoted to the care of the sick, of schools and benevolent institutions; the pensions of the members of the Maria Theresa Order (declaration); the donations connected with the medal for bravery; day laborers; the interest on deposits in savings and post savings banks, all incomes not exceeding 315 florins ($113.08) per annum; the income of mutual laborers' insurance companies; the income from the following public bonds: (a) The 5 per cent Austrian stock or bonds; (b) the Austrian gold bonds; (c) bonds of the city of Vienna of 1867; (d) bonds of the Danube regulating commission of 1878; (e) certain bonds of Tyrol; (f) state railroad bonds; (g) bonds of all railroads subject to tax; (h) bonds of the Austro-Hungarian Bank; (i) bonds of the Mortgage Bank of Bohemia; (j) bonds of the national debt and of the lottery loans of 1854 and 1860; a number of other corporation bonds.

"Fines and penalties.—In case the party subject to the income tax makes either a false return or intentionally neglects to make any return, thrice the amount of the tax is imposed, payment of which, however, includes the tax itself, so that the fine proper is double the amount of the tax.

"The percentage paid as income tax.—Additional percentages have been imposed from time to time, and numerous amendments of the original law have been enacted, and a careful perusal of this mass of legislation furnishes as final result the following:

"Under the first class above mentioned the income tax collected under the laws now in force is progressive and amounts to from 8½ per cent to 10 per cent of the net income. Under the second class from 17 per cent to 20 per cent, and under the third class to 10 per cent."

ITALY.

In 1892 the Italian Government raised about $45,000,000 from an income tax.

In volume 28 of Consular Reports (1883), the consul-general reports from Italy the following (date of report September 23, 1887):

"The tax on incomes is 12 per cent, and an additional sum amounting to one-tenth of this amount as a contribution to the war fund, making a total of 13.20 per cent on the income. (To certain communes there is a restitution of one-tenth of the amount collected for an income tax within their limits.)

"This tax is levied on all incomes derived from any source whatsoever, except from lands and buildings, the manner of assessing differing, however, according to the sources of incomes.

"(a) Permanent incomes, those derived from interests on loans, are taxed at their full amount.

"(b) Temporary incomes accruing from the use of capital and the results of labor and industry are taxed six-eighths of their gross amounts.

"(c) Temporary incomes in which capital and labor are not employed, such as professional incomes, stipends, pensions, etc., are taxed at five-eighths of their gross amounts.

"(d) Incomes derived from stipends, pensions, etc., paid by the State, are taxed at four-eighths of their gross amounts.

"In the above classification, incomes included under the head of b, c, and d, are exempted from taxes whenever the amount of the income does not exceed $77.20, and they are reduced according to a graduated scale $48.26, $38.60, $28.96, and $19.30 if not exceeding $154.40."

SWITZERLAND.

[Extracts from an article entitled "Income and property taxes in Switzerland," by Gustav Cohn, in volume 4, Political Science Quarterly, 1889.]

ZURICH.

Two different tendencies, accordingly are leading to the same result, viz, to the introduction of heavy direct taxation: first, the change of opinion concerning the equities; and secondly, the great increased demand which is itself the product of advanced views regarding the duties of state and community. Both tendencies form part of the general democratic drift of the age. First, the effort is to remove the burdens from the shoulders of the majority of the people and to put them on the shoulders of the wealthy; secondly, an attempt is made to render the public organs of state and community servicable to the interests of the majority in a greater degree than formerly through improved institutions of learning, means of communication, etc. This democratic movement has gone furthest in the canton of Zurich, whose constitution of April 18, 1869, promulgates the following characteristic principles:

"ART. 28. The people exercise the legislative power in conjunction with the cantonal council.

"ART. 30. The popular vote on the legislative acts of the cantonal council (referendum) takes place twice a year, in spring and autumn."

Among the economic principles (article 19) are to be noticed:

"All persons liable to taxation must contribute to the burdens of state and community in proportion to the means at their disposal.

"The property and income tax is to be arranged according to classes on the principle of moderate and just progression.

"Property of small value belonging to persons unable to work, as well as that part of all incomes which is absolutely necessary to life, is exempt.

"The progression shall not exceed five times the simple rate in the case of income nor double the simple rate in case of property.

"Property can be assessed only proportionally for local burdens. The state levies the tax on inheritances progressively according to the remoteness of relationship and the size of the inheritance. No new taxes on the consumption of necessities can be introduced. The salt tax is to be reduced forthwith."

* * * * * * *

In the tax law of Zurich the scale of progression is fixed according to this method, with one scale for property and a second scale, connected with the first, for personal income. The rate for the property tax is so fixed that of the first 20,000 francs of each individual mass of property only five-tenths is put in the tax lists, of the succeding 30,000 francs only six-tenths, of the next 50,000 francs only seven-tenths, of the next 100,000 francs only eight-tenths, of the next succeeding 200,000 francs only nine-tenths, and only the surplus over and above the sum last mentioned is entered at the full amount. We have here a relief in favor of the smaller property, which in the case of the smallest property amounts to one-half of the total sum, a relief which did not exist in the older tax laws of Zurich (1832 and 1861). The amount of the tax to be levied is fixed annually by the cantonal council on motion of the government. The second scale, for personal income, is connected with the first scale in such wise that, according to the provision of the law, 2 francs are paid as taxes on each 100 of the income rate wherever 1 franc is paid on a thousand of the property rate, which means that the average income from property is assumed to be 5 per cent.

The scale of the rate for personal income is then developed in much more rapid progression. In the first place, the minimum of existence declared exempt by the constitution of 1869 is interpreted to include, for every income, the first 500 francs. On the succeeding 1,500 francs only two-tenths is to be put into the tax list, of the next 1,500 francs only four-tenths, of the next 3,000 francs only six-tenths, of the next 4,000 francs only eight-tenths; the full rate beginning with amounts above 10,500 francs. In the income tax, as in the property tax, the relief accrues to every individual income, no matter how large. With the rate as it stands since 1877 (four per mill) an income of 50,000—100,000 francs pays almost 3 per cent, but an income of 2,000 francs only 1½ per cent.

* * * * * * * *

Reckoning together all communal and cantonal taxes paid by an inhabitant of Zurich, the average sum per capita is 32 francs in direct taxes and but 2 francs in indirect taxes. Adding to these the indirect taxes levied for the confederation (principally import duties), we obtain an additional sum of 7½ francs per capita. Altogether, therefore, fully three-fourths is raised in the form which corresponds to the demands of modern radicalism—by income and property taxes.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, stories of suffering always appeal strongly to the humane heart. One of the consummate arts of the orator, of which I submit we have this day had a shining and lustrous example, is to so intertwine righteous sentiments with errors of conclusion and statement as to confuse the judgment of men upon really existing facts.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has depicted suffering in its extreme form. Whether it is as widespread, as deep and universal as he has declared, is a question susceptible, possibly, of proof. What we do know is, that every instance of suffering is caught up and repeated here until it would appear as if, throughout the entire American Union, misery, famine, and starvation were stalking hand in hand. If it be admitted that a tithe of the terrors depicted by the gentleman exists, the picture would still be a very sorrowful one. But organized charity has gone forth, and from the stored-up wealth of the American people has so far relieved the suffering in every city and hamlet of the American Union that not a single instance comes to us of that extreme destitution, penury, and death which mark the end.

NOT DUE TO DEMOCRATIC LAWS.

I am not disposed, however, to undervalue or to underestimate the extent of the suffering actually prevailing. Beginning with the grewsome picture quoted by the gentleman as drawn by Mr. Greeley as long ago as 1855, down to this time, under all circumstances and under all administrations some suffering has prevailed in our land and in every other. There is no community in the world, there never was; there is no system of industry in the world, there never was, in which and under which, at some time or other, human misery has not waited upon human improvidences and human mistakes.

But it is worth noting that the strength of the assault upon the measure before this House is made before that measure has taken effect, months, probably, before one line of it can be operative in any part of the Republic. The suffering that is depicted, supposing it to exist, comes after a period of thirty years of laws written, every one of them, by the Republican party, and not one of them formed by the Democratic party.

The Democratic party during that time has compelled relief and action in regard to certain measures; but the whole responsibility of Government has not been upon us until with the coming in of this Congress on the 4th of March, 1893. And at that time it is a matter of fact susceptible of demonstration, and clear to every gentleman on the floor of this House, that the widespread misery dwelt upon had already descended. Until this hour not a single provision of the protective system which culminated in the McKinley law had been qualified in any degree, either in recital or in operation.

On the contrary, the Democratic Administration which succeeded that of Mr. Harrison enforced that law and is enforcing it to-day as honestly as though it had been written in the statute book by its own Congress.

So, that if the existing condition of affairs may be said to be due to the operation of law, you can not say we did it. So far as the law has produced the ruin that the gentleman depicts, in that far the law has been a law of high protection, rising higher and higher, and finally culminating in the prohibitive tariff of 1890.

THE FARMING INTERESTS ARE ADVANCED BY LABOR AND NOT BY PROTECTION.

I represent in part on this floor the State of Illinois, which, along with her great commercial development, her municipal growth, and her manufacturing progress, is still the formest agricultural State in the Union; her population fairly represents that of the entire United States. About one-half of our people are upon the farms, and the others are in all the varied industries of the time. Such is the general proportion of the entire population of the United States.

Now, during the last thirty years that population has worked, has progressed, and has produced an extraordinary amount of wealth; not because the products of their farms were protected, because we all know that while certain clauses of pretended protection for farmers have been written into law, as a matter of fact they have neither required nor received any genuine protection. It is talking idly to say that because a statute of the United States gives nominal protection to grain, that that has conferred either a market or protection upon the farmers of the country.

It has not done so, but after thirty years of sham protection, here or abroad, all the products of the farm are selling for a less figure than they ever sold before since records were kept of American industries; while "protection" has increased, products have steadily diminished in price until 45 or 50 cents is the best price for wheat, and a like low rate for corn and oats, in spite of the boasted home market reserved by the policy of protection.

But I am not making a speech for the farmer. He spoke for himself in November, 1892, from every hillside and from every prairie in the land. [Applause.] I am seeking to show by statistics that the American farmer has produced a vast amount of wealth, set forth better in two statements which I here insert; one made by the Secretary of Agriculture in 1889, and one compiled by the Statistician of the Agricultural Department from the census of 1890:

As far back as 1880 the value of the farms of the United States exceeded $10,000,000,000. To the unremitting industry of their owners these farms yielded an aggregate annual value of nearly $4,000,000,000, in the production of which a vast population of nearly 8,000,000 toilers utilized nearly half a billion worth of farm implements. The value of live-stock on farms, estimated in the last census to be worth over $1,500,000,000 is shown by the reliable statistics collected by this Department, to be worth to-day $2,507,000,000. A low estimate of the number of farmers and farm laborers employed on our 5,000,000 farms places it at nearly 10,000,000 persons, representing 30,000,000 people, or nearly one-half of our present population.
